Crochet Stitches, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This crochet stitch, which is used for the Crochet Mantelet shown on page 740, is a variation of the Tunisian crochet stitch (see illustration, Fig. 2, page 749), and may be used for a trimming, as well as for working capes, children's muffs, boas, foot-muffs, etc. After making the foundation, work an ordinary Tunisian pattern row of one round going forward and one round going backward. In the 2d pr. (pattern row) take up the stitches on the under side from the same veins of the foundation as in the 1st pr., so that this latter remains untouched, and forms a high rib or wave on the outside. Finish the 2d pr. by casting off, and work the 3d pr. again in the usual manner. In the 4th pr. work again as in the 2d, by passing the needle back of the 3d pr. through the stitches of the 2d pr., which appear on the under side like crosswise veins of stitches (see the stitch indicated by arrow-head on the illustration). Alternate regularly with this different manner of taking up the stitches, so that the waves or ribs are always separated by a common Tunisian pr. In taking up the stitches it must be observed throughout that the same number is preserved.

Fig. 2.—For this crochet stitch, which is that used for the Crochet and Knitted Mantelet shown on page 740, work, first, a Tunisian pr. also. In the first round of the 2d pr. take up the loops in a similar manner, but throw the thread over once between every two and two loops by laying the thread on the needle from the front toward the back. In the second round of this pr. cast off together two loops each, but cast off the thread thrown over separately.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 41.

In taking up the loops in the following pr., first lay the thread on the needle once from the front toward the back, then take up one loop from the next two loops cast off together, and one loop from the thread thrown over that lies before these loops (see the arrow-head shown by the illustration). Cast off in this round as in the preceding pr. The illustrations show the stitches in full size, and no difficulty will be found in working them with the aid of the descriptions. The stitches are those commonly used for afghans and similar articles.

HER HOROSCOPE.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

THAT spell-bound day when she was born
The Signs' great mistress ruled the morn,
And asked of the powers of earth and air
What they would give to make her fair.

"Skin like my light," said the moon, as she fled.
"I'll hide in her hair," the sunshine said.
"Little white teeth like pearls," said the sea.
Said the morning star, "Leave her eyes to me."

"And if," said the sea, "you must have more,
Suppose some day I should fling to shore
The wild free grace which far out and away
Wave tosses to wave in sun and spray?"

Sung the brook, as it babbled over the stones,
"You may put my music into her tones."
Sighed the wind, "From her temple only drop
One curl, there I'll flutter and never stop."

"Let me give her brow," said the twilight sky;
"I will fashion a forehead fair and high,
Fit to shelter pure thoughts and sweet."
Said the earth, "Let me make the way soft for her feet."

And the godmother, "Thank you, a thousand times—
Pleasant promises, tuneful as chimes;
We wouldn't be grasping—but all these things
Early or late will spread their wings."

"Then steadfast truth and sincerity,"
Said the noonday blue, "she shall have from me."
"I will make her heart for every guest
Warm with my sunset fires," said the west.

"Oh," murmured the deeps, "why didn't you say
You wanted a winged spirit in clay?
We can give her strength till she mount and see
The beauty and awe in infinity!"

And a landscape lapped in azure haze,
Where the south wind blows on autumn days,
Vowed on her future to employ
The depth of sorrow, the breadth of joy.

"I will wash her soul," said the summer rain,
"Free forever from soil and stain."
"She shall have our innocence," said the snows;
"My freshness," the dew on the way-side rose.

"Wait," whispered the heavily clustered vine;
"She must surely have a gift of mine:
Spirit, or sweetness, or tendrils' clasp
To those two little arms for a fervent grasp."

And at that the voices of every sprite
Proffered their treasures in sheer delight;
And no one could say who the givers were,
So happy the tumult, so glad the stir.

"I," added at last the motherly earth,
"Will make her the happiness of the hearth;
And if ever, grown weary, my rest she crave,
Some day the soft and forgetful grave."

"Hush!" cried the godmother—"hush, I pray!—
Such a blunder on such a day!
You always were an enormous clod:
Keep such presents under the sod;

"For she lives in the spring-time, she moves in the sun.
Smooth and bright may her pathway run,
As if on the colors sacred and seven—"
"It leads," said her guardian angel, "to heaven!"

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER XVI.

"THIS is the end—the end of all."

So Hannah said to herself when Bernard had left, and she realized that they had truly parted—parted in anger and coldness, after many bitter words spoken on both sides. She repeated it, morning after morning, as days went wearily by; and no letter came—he who was always so punctual in writing. Evidently, then, he meant the parting to be final. He had thrust her entirely out of his new life, in which she could henceforward have no part or lot.

This, under the circumstances, was so inevitable that at first she scarcely blamed him. She only blamed herself for not having long ago foreseen that out of their utterly false position no good end could come—no end but that, indeed, which had come. She had lost him in every relation—as lover, as brother, even as friend. It was sure to be—sooner or later; and yet when the blow did fall, it was a very heavy one; and many times a day she bent under the weight of it in complete abandonment of sorrow.

Not for long, however; women with children can not afford to grieve for long. The very first morning, when she had to explain to Rosie that papa was gone away home, and would not come back again for a good while (she did it in Grace's presence, who opened wide eyes, but said nothing), there was something in the bright face of her "sunshiny child" which soothed her pain. And when, in the strange way that children say the most opportune as well as inopportune things, Rosie sidled up to her, whispering, "Tannie not going away and leave Rosie. Tannie never leave Rosie"—she clasped her to her breast in a passion of tenderness, which was only checked by Rosie's distressed discovery of "Tannie tying."

Of course Tannie immediately dried her eyes, and cried no more—in the child's sight, at any rate.

Nor in any body's sight, for she was one of those who find it not only best, but easiest, to "die and make no sign." Uncovering her wounds would only have made them bleed the more. Besides, what good would it have done? What help could come? Unless the law was altered, the only possibility of marriage for her and Bernard lay in that course which Madame Arthenay had suggested, and which he, with his strong English feeling, and the intensity of all his home affections and associations, had at once set aside as "impossible;" and, knowing him as she did, Hannah agreed that it was impossible. But she would not have him judged or criticised by others who knew him less than she. If there was one little sore place in her heart, she would plaster it over—hide it until it was healed.

Therefore, when Madame Arthenay came as usual, she delivered, in carefully planned phrases, the message Sir Bernard had left; and though the good old lady looked surprised, and evidently guessed—no woman with common womanly penetration could help guessing—that something painful had happened, still, as Hannah said nothing, she inquired nothing, but gave, with a tact and delicacy that won her new friend's love for her whole future life, the best sympathy that even old friends can give sometimes—the sympathy of silence.

They fell back into their old ways, and after a few days this brief, bright visit of Sir Bernard's might never have been, so completely did it cease to be spoken of. Sometimes, in the midst of her innocent play, little Rosie would make a passing reference to "papa," which Aunt Hannah answered with a heart that first leaped wildly, and then sank down, aching with a dull, continual pain. Evidently, not even for his child's sake would Sir Bernard write to her or have any thing to do with her. He had pushed out of his new and prosperous life not only her, but poor Rosie, whom he had left without asking for one good-by kiss. Even the father in him was destroyed by his wretched position with regard to herself, and would be more and more so as time went on. Perhaps it was better, even for that, that the end had come—that there could be no doubt as to their future relations any more.

She thought so—she forced herself to think so—when at last the long-expected letter arrived. It was very brief; and he used to write whole sheets to her every week! And upon its courteously formal tone could be put but one interpretation.

"MY DEAR HANNAH,—I send the usual monthly check doubled, that you and my daughter may have every luxury that Avranches affords, and which, indeed, my new circumstances make desirable and necessary.

"If you do not dislike the place, I should like you to winter there; and, with the friendship and protection of good Madame Arthenay, to try and make it your home—as much home as you can.

"I will say no more at present, being fully occupied with family affairs, and with others which time will disclose, but of which I do not wish to speak till they are more matured. In the mean time I remain always your sincere friend,

"BERNARD RIVERS."

That was all. No anger, no reproaches, no love. No, not a particle—of either lover's love or brother's love—of all that she had become so used to, gradually growing and growing, that how she should live on without it she did not know. Kind he was, kind and thoughtful still—it was his nature, he could not be otherwise—but all personal feeling seemed obliterated. It often happens so with men—at least Hannah had heard of such things—when thwarted passion suddenly cools down, like red-hot iron under a stream of water, and hardens into something totally unlike its old self, the impress of which it ever after retains. This is the only way of accounting for many things—especially for one thing which women can not understand—that sudden marriage after a disappointed love, which is so common and so fatal.

Evidently he could not forgive her; could not restore her to even her old sisterly place with him. He had dropped her as completely out of his life as a weed out of his garden, now only an incumbrance and a reproach.

Well, so it must be. Hannah wondered how she ever could have expected any thing else. She felt just a little sorry for herself—in a vague, abstract way—and fancied other people might be too, if they knew it all. Madame Arthenay, unto whom—to save all explanations—she gave Sir Bernard's letter (alas, all the world might have read it!)—Lady Dunsmore, whose correspondence was as regular and affectionate as ever, but who now never mentioned the name of Rivers; and, lastly, poor faithful Grace, who followed her mistress with yearning eyes, doing every thing that humble devotion could do to give her pleasure or to save her pain, but never saying one single word. These two Pariahs of society—as Hannah sometimes in her heart bitterly called herself and her servant—clung to one another with a silent trust which was a comfort to both.

But their greatest comfort was the child. Rosie flourished like a flower. Every day in her young life brought some new and wonderful development. That miraculous study of a growing human soul lay patent before Hannah every day, soothing, calming, and interesting her, till sometimes she became almost reconciled to her pain. It was not the sharp agony of youth—she was accustomed to sorrow—but this sorrow had come too late to be cured. She knew it would not kill her; but she also knew that it would last her life. She had been a long time in loving Bernard; but now that she did love him, it was with a depth and intensity which those only know to whom love is the last remnant of that dolce primavera—that sweet heart spring-time—after which nothing can be looked for but winter and old age.

She wondered how her years would pass—the years which would make little Rosie into a woman. And she wondered very much about the child, how she should be educated, and where. Sir Bernard only spoke of their wintering at Avranches—having no farther plans for Rosie's future; nor had he ever had any that Hannah knew of. He had seemed to take it for granted that they three—she, himself, and the child—would always be together, and that there was no need to decide any thing. In what manner he might wish his daughter—an important personage now, as Miss Rivers of the Moat House—to be brought up, Hannah had not the slightest idea.

However, one day, when they were driving through this smiling Norman country, where the long lines of poplars had not yet dropped a single leaf, and the quaint old trees of the endless apple orchards stood each with a glowing heap of dropped fruit round its feet, making Rosie clap her hands in delight, the little woman herself settled that question.

"Lots of apples! Rosie likes apples. Rosie stay here always, and get lots of apples."

A sentence which startled Hannah into deeper and more anxious thought than she had yet expended on her child's future. Truly her child's; she had now none of her own. She never for a moment deceived herself that to her happiness would ever come—that happiness which had fled from her all her life like a beautiful mirage. Only, by the mercy of God, she had been made—as she sometimes thought, with that bitter laugh that is akin to tears—a rugged old camel, who could bear endless burdens, endure weariness and hunger and thirst. The desert would be crossed some day, and she should lie down and rest.

But, in the mean time, would it be good for Rosie to remain in France, ignorant of her English ties—ignorant, above all, of her father, whom already, with the easy forgetfulness of her age, she seldom spoke about? What seemed at first a relief became to Hannah by-and-by a serious care.

Would she be quite right in binding Sir Bernard to the promise—which she knew he himself would never break—that Rosie should be with her always? In the years to come might not this deprive both father and daughter of the greatest blessing of their lives?

Hannah remembered—in the utter blotting out of hope it was now doubly sweet to remember—how tenderly she had loved her own father; how after her mother's death she had been his constant companion and friend, with a tie so close that even his disapproval of the attachment between her and Arthur could not break it. This tie—the love between father and eldest daughter—Rosie would in all human probability never know.

Then, too, around Bernard, so young a man still, would soon spring up not only new interests, but new ties. She tried to fancy him Sir Bernard Rivers, master of the Moat House—and what a noble master he would make!—beloved by all the country-side, bringing to it in due time a new Lady Rivers, fair and sweet as his first wife had been, and perhaps raising up in honor and happiness a numerous family—Rosie's brothers and sisters—to whom poor Rosie would be even less than she was to her father—a stranger, an interloper, unto whom the dear associations of kindred blood were only a name.

Forecasting all this, seeing it with a cruelly clear prevision, as the inevitable result of things, Hannah, even while she clasped her darling to her bosom, sometimes doubted whether hers were not a fatal love, which might one day overcloud, instead of brightening, the future of this her "sunshiny child."

"I may have to do it some time," she said to herself, not daring even in thought to particularize what "it" meant. "But I can't do it yet—not yet. My one blessing—the only bit of blessedness left me in this world!"

And night after night, when she lay listening to the soft breathing, thanking God that her treasure was still hers, close beside her, looking to her, and her alone, for the providing of every pleasure, the defense from every ill that the innocent young life could know, Hannah wetted her pillow with her tears.

"I can not do it; even if I ought, I can not," she moaned; and then let the struggle cease. She was not strong enough to struggle now. She rather let herself drift, without oar or sail, just where the waters carried her. Bitter waters they were, but she knew they were carrying her slowly and surely home.

In this dreamy state she remained during the whole of the brief, bright lull of the St. Martin's summer, which lasted longer than usual in Normandy this year, busying herself chiefly in planning pleasures for the two on whom life's burdens had either not yet fallen, or were near being laid down—the old lady and the child. With them, and Grace, she wandered every where near Avranches, and made herself familiar with every nook of this pleasant country, which Bernard in his letter had suggested she should try to substitute for "home." Well, what did it matter? It was little consequence where she and Rosie lived, so that they were far away from him. This must have been what he meant, and she accepted it as such.

With her usual habit of what he had sometimes called "horrid resignation," she had almost grown fond of the place, and even, in a sense, was happy in it, when one day there arose upon the strange, stupor-like peace of her daily life one of those sudden blasts of fate—like the equinoctial wind in which the St. Martin's summer ended—a storm noted in this neighborhood for years by the destruction which it had spread. Hannah never heard it spoken of afterward without recalling that particular day, and all that happened thereon.

The hurricane had lasted for twenty-four hours, and was still unabated, when, restless with staying in-doors, she went out—alone; of course—which was unusual; but any danger there might be must not happen to the child. For herself, she used once rather to enjoy danger, to exult in a high wind, as being something to fight against; but now, when she passed out of the town, and saw the desolation that a few hours had made—tall poplars, snapped like straws, lying prone at the road-side; apple orchards in which there was scarcely a tree not mutilated, and many were torn up completely by the roots—she ceased to delight in the storm. She battled with it, however, as long as she could, though it was almost like beating against a stone wall; and then, unable to fight more, she sank, exhausted, in the first sheltered corner she could find.

"How weak I must be growing!" said poor Hannah to herself; and, catching sight of her favorite Mont St. Michel, the solitary rock, with its castled crown, looking seaward over its long stretch of sandy bay, the tears sprang to her eyes. Alas! there was no St. Michael to fight for her—no strong archangel to unsheath his glittering sword in defense of right or in destruction of wrong. She was a lonely woman, with not a creature to defend her—neither father, brother, husband, nor lover. Also, she was powerless to defend herself; she knew—she felt—that her fighting days were all done. That ghostly gleam of love and hope which had brightened her life had passed away even like this St. Martin's summer, in storm and tempest, and would never come back any more.

Tired—so tired that she could scarcely crawl—Hannah retraced her steps, hastening them a little, as she found it was near post-time, and then smiling sadly at herself for so doing. What could the post bring her? Nothing, of course. Her last letter to Sir Bernard, a mere imitation of his own, acknowledging his money—which she had no conscience-stings about taking, for she spent it all upon Rosie—and agreeing to his proposal of their wintering at Avranches, had remained now three weeks unanswered. Better so, perhaps. Total silence was far less painful than such a correspondence.

There was one English letter—for Grace—which, as it bore the Easterham post-mark, she took to her herself, and lingered half involuntarily while it was opened and read.

"No bad news, I trust?"—for Grace had uttered an exclamation, and seemed a good deal disturbed. "No harm happened to—to any one belonging to you?"

For though Grace now seldom mentioned Jem Dixon's name, they both knew that he was still at Easterham, slowly drinking himself to death—partly, he declared, because, since Grace left him, he had such a wretched home. Continually there was the chance of hearing that he had come to some ill end, and Hannah was uncertain how much Grace might feel it, or whether, in that case, she would not desire to go back at once to her sister's children, for whom she had had so strong an affection.

"No, ma'am," she said, looking at Miss Thellusson half inquisitively, half compassionately, "it's no harm, so to speak, come to any body. It's only a wedding that they tell me of, a wedding I didn't expect, and I'm very sorry for it."

"Of some friend or relation of yours—and you don't quite like it, I see? Never mind, it may turn out better than you think; marriages sometimes do, I suppose."

A commonplace, absently uttered sentiment; but Hannah was often very absent now. Life and its interests seemed fading daily from her, as from people who are going to die, and from whom, mercifully perhaps, all the outer world gradually recedes, growing indistinct and colorless as at twilight time; but also calm—very calm. She could not rouse herself even into her old quick sympathy with other people's troubles, though she saw that Grace was very much troubled about this letter, and continued so all day. Once upon a time the kind mistress would have questioned her about it, but now she took no notice, not till the two were together in the nursery, sharing the little bit of innocent fun with which Rosie always concluded their day. For Rosie was the drollest little woman at her bed-time, playing such antics in her bath, and carrying on the most amusing conversation while she ate her supper, that neither aunt nor nurse could forbear laughing. But to-night it was different, and the sharp little eyes soon detected that.

"Look, Tannie," she whispered, mysteriously, "Dacie tying. Dacie hurt herself, p'raps. Poor Dacie tying."

And in truth Grace, who stood behind her mistress and the child, had just wiped her eyes upon the towel she held.

"No; I haven't hurt myself, and it isn't myself I'm crying for. Never mind me, Miss Rosie."

"But we do mind, don't we?" and Miss Thellusson put her hand kindly on the nurse's shoulder as she knelt. "You shall tell me all about it presently. In the mean time, don't vex yourself more than you can help. Nothing in life is worth grieving for very much—at least, I often think so." And Hannah sighed. "We have but to do our duty, and be as content as we can. Every thing is passing away—soon passing away."

Grace's tears fell only the faster. "It isn't myself, ma'am—oh, please don't think that! I am not unhappy now. You are so kind to me, and then I have Miss Rosie; but what vexes me is this wedding I've heard about, and how people will take it, and—"

"Oh, I dare say it will all come right soon," said Hannah, listlessly, rocking her little one in her arms, and feeling that love and lovers and weddings were things belonging to a phase of existence as far back as the world before the flood. "Who may the people be? Any body I know?"

Grace stopped a minute before she answered, and then said, dropping her eyes, "Is it possible, ma'am, that you don't know?"

"How should I know?"

"I thought—I have been thinking all day, surely he must have told you."

"Who told me?"

"Master—Sir Bernard. It's his wedding that my sister tells me about. Oh dear! oh dear!"

All the blood in Hannah's heart stood still. Had it not been for the unmistakable meaning of Grace's sorrow, and the necessity of self-command that it enforced, she might have fainted; but her strong will conquered. She did not "give way," as women call it, by any outward sign.

"Is Sir Bernard married? There must be some mistake. He would, as you say, certainly have told me."

"No; I didn't mean that he was exactly married, but that he is going to be. All the village says it. And to the last person I'd ever have thought he would marry—Miss Alice Melville."

"Hush!" said Hannah, glancing at the child; for Rosie, already growing a dangerous little person to speak before, was listening with all her eyes and ears. Happily, in the silence into which his name had fallen, she had not yet learned to identify "papa" with "Sir Bernard," so that as soon as she had got over her natural indignation at seeing aunt and nurse speaking of something which did not include her, who at this hour especially was always their sole object of attention, she curled sleepily down in Tannie's arms, a round little ball, with the pink toes sticking out from under the white night-gown—begging earnestly for "'Four-and-twenty blackbirds baked in a pie,' just once, once more."

And Hannah sang it, without a mistake, which the small listener would have detected immediately—without a break in her voice either. For Grace also was listening—Grace, who might go back to Easterham any day, and tell Easterham any thing. Not that she thought Grace would, but she might. And now, above all, whatever Easterham guessed, it must never be given the slightest certainty that Sir Bernard had ever been aught to her except a brother-in-law.

Therefore Hannah laid Rosie peacefully in her crib, going through all the little ceremonies of tucking in and smoothing down, the "one, one more 'ittle song," and the "two tisses," which had been their mutual nightly delight for so long. Then she left her darling happy and at rest, and walked slowly down stairs, Grace following. Thankfully would she have fled away, and hidden herself any where out of sight, but this could not be. So she looked steadily in her servant's face.

"Now tell me all about this report concerning Sir Bernard."

It was a very natural and probable one, as reports go, and seemed to have been generally accepted at Easterham. The two were continually seen together at the Grange and the Moat House, and it was said they only waited for their mutual mourning to end, in order to fix their wedding-day. More especially as, many years ago, when they were mere boy and girl, they were supposed to have been fond of one another.

"She was fond of him, at any rate," Grace declared. "We servants all thought so when I lived at the Grange. She was a nice, pretty young lady, too. But she isn't young now, of course; not pretty either; only she is very, very good—capital about parish things, and so on; and the kindest heart in the world to poor folks' children. She was so kind to mine," added Grace, with a sob.

Hannah again laid her hands soothingly on her servant's shoulder, but with a strangely absent look.

"Not young—not pretty—only very good. She would make a good wife to him, no doubt."

"Yes," said Grace, hesitating. "Only—who'd ever have thought of master's wanting her? I didn't, I'm sure. Why, nice as she is, she isn't fit to hold a candle to—"

Hannah stopped her, terrified. "Hush, you forget yourself. Sir Bernard's servant has no right to discuss his future wife. You will displease me exceedingly if you say another word on the subject."

Had there been the slightest betrayal on Hannah's part, the poor nurse's heart would have overflowed. As it was, she was simply bewildered.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Thelluson. Us poor servants have no right, I suppose, to be sorry for our betters. But I was sorry many a time, because I thought—"

"Think nothing at all, say nothing at all, either to me or to any one. My sister has been dead three years; her husband is at perfect liberty to marry again as soon as he chooses. And he could hardly marry a better person than Miss Melville. I am—very glad."

"Are you?" said Grace, looking at her very earnestly. And then Hannah, driven to bay, and feeling the fierce necessity of the moment, looked back at Grace and, almost for the first time in her life, acted a lie.

"Certainly. Why should I not be glad of my brother-in-law's marriage?"

There was no answer, of course. Grace, completely puzzled, ventured no more; but putting the letter in her pocket, begged pardon once again, and, sighing, went away.

So far, then, Hannah was safe. She had borne the blow, nor allowed her servant to suspect what a death-blow it was; nay, she had even succeeded in concealing the fact that it had come upon her unawares. Poor innocent hypocrite! the lessons taught by the last bitter year and a half had not been lost upon her. But when Grace was gone she sat utterly paralyzed.

Over and over again she had repeated to herself that all was at an end between her and Bernard; but she had never contemplated such an end as this. So sudden, too—scarcely six weeks from the time she had parted from him—when he had been her ardent, despairing, desperate lover; furious because she would not sacrifice every thing for him, as he said he was ready to do for her. And now he was quite ready to marry another woman. Could it be true? Was it probable—possible?

Something in Hannah's secret heart whispered that it was; that his impulsiveness of temperament, his extreme affectionateness and corresponding need of affection, made a hasty marriage like this, to one whom he knew well, and who had always been fond of him, not incomprehensible even to her. And yet—and yet—

"He might have waited—just a little while; have mourned for me just for a few weeks—a few months—as he did for my poor Rosa."

And her tears dropped fast—fast; not the scalding tears of youth, but very bitter tears, nevertheless. She had loved him so well, had endured so much for him, had had such a bright dream of what she was to him. Could it have been only a dream? Would any other woman be just as dear to him as she? And though she did not faint, or shriek, or moan, or do any of those desperate things which tragic heroines are supposed to indulge in upon hearing of the marriage of their lovers; though she went to bed and slept, and rose next morning just as if nothing had happened, still Hannah felt that something had happened—something which would make the world look never quite the same as it looked yesterday.

That yesterday was the last day she crossed the threshold for two whole weeks. The doctor said she ought not to have gone out in the high wind; that, out of health as she was before, it had caught her in some way, affected her breathing, smitten her at her heart. At which Miss Thelluson smiled. She knew she was "smitten to the heart."

FLOWERING-SUNDAY.

ANNIVERSARIES kept in remembrance of the dead should touch a sympathetic chord in the hearts of the living—soon themselves to be numbered among them. Yet are there persons who, so far from finding in their recurrence calmness, peace, and consolation, dread them, as they shun all sights, sounds, thoughts, or words which in any way remind them of their own inevitable doom.

Yet surely, apart from the affection we owe to those we have lost, what can be more just than to spare them an occasional remembrance, and at the same time what more salutary than to snatch from the hours we so willingly devote to pleasure, and so readily accord to business, occasional times and seasons for the contemplation of our own daily approaching journey on the same untried road?

There are so many days in the course of the year consecrated to pleasure, to frivolity, to business, to all that interests, diverts, and profits the living, shall we grudge the dead one solitary anniversary in these times, when we are in such haste to set aside our weeds and strip off our mourning? For the most part, scarcely are the dead removed from our sight before they are forgotten. And yet they loved us well—nay, they love us still. The Book which can not err declares that "love is stronger than death," and the thought is dear to our hearts; it is by a spontaneous impulse that we believe in "the communion of saints."

To consecrate a special day, then, to the consideration of death is not only an act of justice, since it prompts us to pay our tribute of affection to the departed, but it is "greatly wise," as an exercise of self-discipline and forethought in behalf of our own best interests.

The Roman Catholic Church has preserved, among the other customs of the early Christians, that of practically reminding her children of the evanescence of their lives, in the simple and touching little ceremony of Ash-Wednesday, when men, women, and even little infants kneel before the altar, while the priest, signing each one on the forehead with the emblem of contrition and penance, recalls to him his mortality in the solemn words, "Memento, homo, quia pulvis es, et in pulverem reverteris."

The observance of All-Souls Day was maintained in England until the end of the sixteenth century, as appears by a council held at Oxford in 1622; but the usage of visiting the graves of departed friends on that day is now confined to the Continent.

There is, nevertheless, still a remote corner of the country where this pious custom has survived to our own times, and is followed with a fervor and a zeal as edifying as devout; the season, however, so far from corresponding with that of the ancient calendar, and fixed late in the autumn, is here chosen at early spring-tide. Both seem appropriate, and both are suggestive, but of an entirely different class of associations.

The annual frequenting of church-yards, and decking of graves on a prescribed day, are more or less strictly maintained in more than one part of Wales; but it is in Monmouthshire that it is carried out with real fervor and enthusiasm. Within that county and on its immediate borders "Flowering-Sunday" is still a festival celebrated alike by all classes; distinctions of rank and social position, as well as of religious belief, being forgotten in the presence of a common interest so absorbing.

The Sunday thus distinguished is that known to the Christian world as Palm-Sunday; and as it approaches the probabilities of favorable weather are weighed and canvassed with considerable anxiety; for, although a blue sky and genial temperature are naturally welcomed as a great boon, yet the pilgrimage is sure to be conscientiously performed by all who are not actually bedridden, whatever the state of the atmosphere.

So sacred, indeed, is deemed the duty which this day recalls that the light has scarcely dawned before—as if emulating the zeal of the holy women of old, who started "very early in the morning, on the first day of the week," to carry their sweet spices to the holy sepulchre—the bereaved of all classes and denominations, all ages and both sexes, may be seen leaving their homes, laden with the best and choicest flowers they can afford, and wending their way to the last resting-place of parents, spouse, brother, sister, or child, there to deposit the graceful and fragrant but evanescent token of their undying love, which continues to survive the grave.

Various are the devices with which the same sentiment inspires different minds: some may be observed sprinkling with flowers the graves of those they loved; others disposing them in vessels supplied with water, so as to keep them fresh as long as possible; some carry with them their tools, and plant the sod with shrubs or growing flowers; and those whose means admit of the expense are attended by their gardeners, bringing the choicest and most costly exotics. Often a poor man may be observed arranging pieces of looking-glass among his flowers, so as to double their effect; while many devote a loving labor to the cultivation of a beautiful little plant found only on the higher gradients of Monmouthshire, and called "snow of the mountain," answering to the Edelweiss of Tyrol. There is a simple and touching poetry in the instinct which suggests this emblem of fragrance and purity as an appropriate pall to mantle the turfy mound beneath which repose the remains of little children and young maidens; and the survivors tax their ingenuity to contrive the time of planting so that the white blossoms may appear in all their dazzling perfection on Flowering-Sunday; and often we may see in the midst of a grave a cross surrounded with lilies.

Not a church-yard throughout this part of ancient Gwent but bears its testimony to the fidelity of its people; and that of St. Mary's, Monmouth, one of the most picturesque and beautifully situated in Wales, is a perfect marvel of bloom: a stranger visiting this city, and unaware of the cause, would wonder at the sight of what might almost seem a horticultural competition within the sacred precincts.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AMONG the appalling tragedies wrought by swift-winged fires in Western woods and prairies the sad experience of many a solitary settler appeals to our sympathy in a peculiar manner. One case is mentioned by a Detroit journal, which, doubtless, is but a type of hundreds of others. About ten miles above Forestville, Michigan, lived a Mr. Kent, his wife, and two children. The fires had been running in the woods for months, and for ten days previous to the tragic incident we are about to mention the smoke had become very dense in the vicinity. Although Mr. Kent had reason to apprehend danger, he stood by his little property, hoping to preserve it. There was a considerable clearing around his house, and he believed the flames would not reach him. Moreover, he had plenty of water near by, and filled barrels and tubs, and placed them where they would be of service in extinguishing sparks. One dreadful night the roaring of the flames could be heard at the settler's house. No lamp was needed; the heavens were illuminated all around. Toward noon of the next day the flames appeared on the outskirts of Mr. Kent's farm. His children, two little girls, the youngest not a year old, were left in the house, and husband and wife repaired to the fire to try to beat it back. With any thing which would strike or smother they fought the advancing flames, and for a distance of twenty rods kept them in check. But while busy here the flames crept over the dry ground from other directions, unheeded and neglected. Fighting with all their strength, father and mother gave no heed to any thing but the fire before them, until they were at last startled by a scream from the house. Instinctively they felt that the flames had seized it, and rushed to the rescue of the children. Alas! the blinding smoke had settled thickly down. The distracted parents ran in every direction without finding the house. Suddenly, while they were groping in the dense smoke, the fall and crash of the roof told them their little ones had met an awful fate. "It made us crazy," said the anguished father, as he afterward related the terrible tale. But with a desperate grasp, knowing there remained but one thing to do, the husband caught hold of his wife, and plunging through fire and smoke, scarcely keeping ahead of the sheet of flame behind them, they at length reached the lake, five miles distant, scorched and bruised and childless.

The Western Female Seminary, Oxford, Ohio, which was completely destroyed by fire last April, has been rebuilt, and reopened recently with 150 scholars. The enterprise and zeal of the friends of this benevolent institution are worthy of commendation.

One-third of the citizens of the Hague, the political capital of Holland, are rich enough to live entirely on their incomes. This town is reported to be the wealthiest, for its population, in the world.

San Francisco, scarcely more than a barren waste twenty years ago, to-day contains 170,000 inhabitants.

The Cornell Era is not only edited, but printed, by the students of Cornell University. A complete printing establishment, with a large Hoe press driven by steam, forms a very useful accompaniment to the usual apparatus of a literary institution.

A good story is told in the Swiss Times of a native of Fribourg, who presented himself at the window of the post-office at Lausanne, and asked for an order of 100 francs. The clerk put the following usual questions to him:

"Who is the sender?"

"Jacques Mathieu."

"What is the name of the payee?"

"Jacques Mathieu, poste restante at Estavayer."

"Is he your brother?"

"No; it is myself."

"Do you mean to say that you are sending a post-office order to yourself at Estavayer?"

"Yes; I am going there."

"But why can't you take it yourself?"

"Ah, there it is," said the simple fellow; "you see, I know myself. If I were to take the money with me, the probability is that it would never reach Estavayer, while by sending it through the post-office I shall be sure to find it on my arrival, where I shall require it."

The Young Ladies' Christian Association is quietly doing a much-needed work for friendless and deserving young women. It undertakes to find for such employment and pleasant boarding places, offers them the use of a library, and endeavors in various ways to promote their physical, moral, and religious welfare. A fine-sewing department has been organized for the purpose of providing work for the class sought to be benefited, and is now prepared to receive orders for all kinds of fine sewing at the rooms, No. 64 Irving Place, corner of Eighteenth Street, where ladies' and children's under-garments, infants' wardrobes, etc., are kept for sale. The patronage of ladies interested in the objects of the association is solicited, and they are cordially invited to call and interest themselves in the work.

"How about my house?" asked an absent resident of Chicago, as, while hastening thither, he met a friend who had just left the burning city.

"Burned," was the laconic reply.

The next question consisted merely of a searching glance, and the answer was, "She's all right, at father's. We got your papers out of the safe this morning; they are all right too."

"Well," said the merchant, coolly, "when a man has his wife and his papers, what more does he want?"

The Crown Prince of Prussia declined last year the dedication of ninety-two books and fifteen works of art.

A species of beautiful pink coral has been discovered on the coast of Palmi, in Calabria. The local sailors have gathered a goodly quantity, and some blocks of an extraordinary size have been extracted.

Berlin is said to be crowded just now with teachers of the French language—the whole number being estimated at fifteen hundred.

A remarkable phenomenon lately occurred in the district of Telchefs, in Lithuania. Near the little town of Wromin was a lake about five miles long and three wide, which was noted for its abundance of fish. A few weeks since, during a perfect calm, the waters of this lake rose and were agitated as if by a violent tempest, while a strong sulphurous smell rising from them pervaded the locality. After two or three days this ebullition ceased, and the surface of the lake was covered with dead fish, some of which weighed two hundred pounds each. Fearing their decomposition would breed pestilence, the inhabitants of the neighboring village were called upon to collect them, and they were buried with a goodly covering of lime. Since then the lake began to sink, while the sulphurous odor increased daily, and the lake at the latest accounts had become nearly dry. It is supposed that the limestone and chalk bottom of the lake has given way, and the waters have sunk into a subterranean canal.

On the top of the unfinished tower of Strasburg Cathedral is a good-sized dwelling-house, occupied by several men, who have charge of the clock and bells. During the entire siege they remained up there, exposed every moment to the falling shells. They describe the period as one of fearful horror. When fragments of the outer decorations were knocked off, and fell with a crash to the pavement, they believed their hour had come. Yet they thought not of deserting their post. "It was our duty to stay up here," said one of the men, "and we staid."

The latest "fish story" is told of a young lady residing near Portree, Scotland, who, while dressing on the beach after bathing, observed a large fish swimming near the shore. Having read of the capture of several sharks on the coast lately, she felt slightly timid at first to encounter the monster, but resolved, shark or no shark, to make the attempt; so in she plunged, half dressed as she was, and after several efforts managed to grasp and land the fish, which weighed no less than thirty-five pounds, and proved to be a small specimen of the sun-fish—very rare in those waters.

Among the singular incidents of the siege of Paris may be mentioned the fact that three Wesleyan chapels were uninjured, while all other houses and public buildings in their vicinity were totally demolished.

Chicago opens a field for the skillful and faithful laborer. The Tribune of that city says that from five to six hundred additional brick and stone masons can find employment there through the winter at good wages. Also that two thousand carpenters can be employed there during the winter, and more than that number when spring comes. Skilled workers in the useful arts can always find enough to do, and at good wages. It is the unfaithful and unskillful laborer, in general, who has nothing to do. First-class work commands a first-class price; but it can not be expected that a poor quality of work will be equally remunerative.

Chicago is not burned up. While 18,000 houses have been swept away, 42,000 yet remain; and while 92,000 persons have been rendered homeless, an immense city of 245,000 persons has not been disturbed. The whole of the immense area of the West Division, with its miles of dwelling-houses, stores, school-houses, churches, and manufactories, is almost intact; while upon the South Side a great many fine residences yet remain, with splendid business blocks, churches, and innumerable manufacturing establishments.

The following comparative statements concerning the two great tunnels of the world are interesting: Mont Cenis Tunnel—length, 12,236 meters, or nearly eight miles; width, 26 feet 8 inches; height, 20 feet; cost, $13,000,000; time occupied in construction, nine years; number of workmen employed, about 2000. Hoosic Tunnel—length, 26,061 feet, or nearly five miles; width, 24 feet; height, 21 feet; cost, about $9,000,000; time of construction, when completed, nearly twenty years; number of workmen employed, about 700 at present, but much less during most of the time the work has been prosecuted. There is every reason to believe that the Hoosic Tunnel will be completed before March 15, 1874—the date named in the contract.

Switzerland has a very good supply of public libraries—no less than twenty-five, containing 920,520 volumes. In addition, there are 1629 popular and educational libraries, containing 687,939 volumes. The largest libraries are those of Zurich, with 100,000 volumes; Basle, with 95,000; Lucerne, with 80,000.

ject than a hat after a heavy shower? Pulpy, porous does the hat become—a locomotive water-spout; nor does a greater wretch breathe than he who seems to appeal for help, but finds it not, from under a hat. Hats are heathen, dogmatical, dogged; fit rather for dogs than men; things to alarm; things to fire off from the mouth of a cannon, and to astonish an enemy with. What is more insupportable than the sauciness of a new hat paraded in your face? You feel ashamed or "small" at it, unless your own hat be brand-new. The new hat, all shine and "simper," as it were, on the head of your enemy—for every man is your enemy with a new hat—is an unwarrantable insult. Of this the wearers even seem conscious; for they are never at ease under a new hat, and they blush and fidget, as if they had got a great glorification on their head putting you down.

Hats are a prodigious generation. They increase and multiply, and they populate the earth. Hats are of all ages, sizes, and conditions. The reflection alone that there are millions of hats in the world will dismay. They are a cloud on the earth. There are hats large, languid, lawful, or legal; small and simple, broad and belligerent. They are serious, dignified, aldermanic, church-like, attorney-like, rotund, rhomboidal, or curvilinear; they are cusped and globular, puny and perky, insolent or somnolent, vinous and vicarious, domineering or "devil-may-carish." In a word—to borrow a figure from that game at cards called among the old-fashioned "all-fours"—hats hint of all and of every thing, of "high, low, Jack, and the game"—and the lame as well. Besides other wonders, we have found hats even musical in certain states of the wind—pipes adroitly fingered according to the stops. Some hats are sonorous, as, if you try upon the roof, you will, perhaps, have proof; or if you tap to prove the crown of your hat like a drum, something will come. Again, as to new hats, I never forgive a man that I may meet with a new hat, unless he makes to me the amplest apologies, due to me from his wearing a hat at all.

NATURE'S JEWELS.

THE orchard lands are all aglow with gems,
Rich perfumed gems, from Nature's casket strewn—
Pearls on the pear, on apple opals pink;
Rich rubies on the quince, and amethysts
Upon the peach and almond: fairer gems
Than light the sceptre of the proudest throne.

The scarlet blush sits on the queenly blooms
Of the pomegranate, and the whitening buds
Of April snow-showers flake the jargonelle;
Here the pink blossoms of the glorious peach,
Superb sultana, mingle with the flowers
Of the retiring tender apricot;
And there the quince her fragrant petals hides
Beneath the shadow of the damascene.

Showed ever iris in prismatic bow
More gorgeous mingling of a thousand hues
Than show the orchards? while the trellised wall
Glows 'neath the stars of yellow jessamine
In natural topaz, and the sapphire gleams
In heaven's unclouded ceiling purely blue?

Jewels, rich jewels, fair and sweet and rare,
Renewed from year to year; jewels all sweet,
That cost nor toiling days nor sleepless nights
For gold to purchase them; jewels on which
The humblest eye may gaze, the poor and rich
May both alike have share; gems which when dead
Leave a rich legacy of fruits to earth,
And with the spring reviving, bloom again!

OCTAVIA HADLEIGH'S STORY.

WHERE and how shall I begin it? Unlike Canning's knife-grinder, I have a story to tell; but to live a thing and to relate it are so different.

I wonder if the humble moth, safely sheltered beneath the protecting greenery of some household cabbage, ever feels a thrill of envy when the gorgeous butterfly, with wings all ablaze with velvety maroon and gold, alights close by him? If so, the moth must feel just as I felt when Cornelia Bydexter sat in our poor little parlor that November day, with her chains and rings, and looped-up draperies of cashmere, and primrose-colored kid gloves buttoned with links of gold.

It was rather hard; for I could remember the old days when Cornelia and I went to school together, and I wrote her compositions for her, and looked out the hard words in the French dictionary. There is no republic like a school, and Cornelia was thankful to be allowed to sit next to me then; and now she actually presumed to patronize me: no, not exactly that, either; for Cornelia Bydexter, notwithstanding her lack of brains, was an honest, warm-hearted sort of girl. But the poor are sensitive; and although I was pleased to see my old school-mate, the pleasure was not unmixed with bitterness.

Yes, we were poor; and the fact stared me in the face wherever I ventured to look. That we had been rich was no manner of consolation. The room was filled with ill-assorted relics of furniture that had once been splendid in rosewood shine and gleams of satin and brocatelle. The carpets, now worn threadbare, were of royal velvet and Axminster, and the whole apartment bore vestiges of that shabby gentility, that poor pretense of newness and freshness, which is more pathetic by far than the undisguised front of poverty. I was tired of arranging the curtains so that the darned spots should fall in the inner folds, I was weary of putting glued chairs in the least-used corners, and setting mended china vases in the shadowy nooks of mantel and table. Where was the use? Did not every body see through our miserable devices? We were poverty-stricken, and there was an end of it.

And yet poor papa sat there in that forlorn, second-rate little room like a viscount in his reception chamber. Dear papa! ever since his paralytic stroke he had seemed to believe in himself to a degree I could not possibly attain to, and to imagine that the world also put faith in him. Nor would we have had it otherwise. And dear mamma, who could not look aught else than a lady in spite of mended laces and oft-turned silks, never told him of the daily contests with unpaid butcher, dissatisfied baker, and clamorously insolent candlestick-maker! And Jeannette and I, just at the age when life ought—according to all we had read and heard—to wear its sunniest aspect, grew up in the shadow, crying softly to ourselves when it was bitterest to endure in silence—for it was a part of our domestic creed to keep all the disagreeables from poor papa.

"Yes," said papa, nodding his head as he sat in a gorgeous Turkish dressing-gown by the window, his slippered feet on an embroidered ottoman, and one white slender finger inserted between the pages of the book he had been reading all the morning—"yes, you are quite right, Miss Bydexter; Octavia is growing very pretty."

And I could feel myself blushing scarlet, between my delight at receiving a compliment from papa and my embarrassment at feeling all the family eyes—Miss Bydexter's included—turned upon me.

"It's a shame she should be shut up here!" said Miss Bydexter, in her soft soprano voice, "when all the world is getting ready to enjoy itself. Come, Octavia, what do you say to going with me to New York this winter?"

"Wife," said papa, loftily—somehow the manner was just as natural to him as the air he breathed—"why don't we send our little girl to New York? Miss Bydexter's kind offer ought not to be slighted, and it really would be a great advantage, socially speaking, to the child."

Visions of Broadway seen through the sunshine of a December day, of the Fifth Avenue and Central Park, Stewart's and Delmonico's, of brass bands and lighted ball-rooms, shot dizzily across my brain for the instant, as a hungry man dreams of unlimited food. I felt the burn of the kindling lights in my eyes as I looked from papa to mamma. And then common-sense, for a moment frightened off her throne, came back to me, and I knew how impracticable, not to say impossible, the plan was. But Jeannette uttered a little rapturous cry.

"Oh, Octavia, wouldn't it be nice! If we only had the money!"

"Yes—if," mamma answered, with that soft, moonlight sort of smile she has at times. "But you know, my dear—"

But papa would not allow her to finish the sentence. A deep, mahogany-colored flush mounted to his forehead, and I saw his brows meet darkly.

"If Octavia wishes," he said, "I can very easily draw a check upon the bank for her expenses."

Mamma breathed quick and short; Jeannette opened wide her honest blue eyes.

"It would be delightful!" said Miss Cornelia Bydexter, to whom one or two hundred dollars was no more than they would be to the lilies of the field, who "toil not, neither do they spin." And poor mamma, who knew very well that the hundred and fifty dollars at the bank were imperatively needed for the already over-due rent, skillfully engineered the conversation away from the rocks and shoals which portended the shipwreck of our domestic peace.

"Yes, indeed," said Miss Bydexter, unconsciously following mamma's lead, and plunging into the great "service" channel. "I've been very badly treated; but servants are a thankless race. Louise has left me, the ungrateful thing! Forty dollars a month I was paying her, too."

"That is a great sum to pay," said mamma; and I knew the pang with which she was thinking that that was exactly the sum in which we were indebted to Dr. Mortimore. Not a large amount in itself, to be sure, but enough to make us shrink from encountering him. Had I not gone a good quarter of a mile out of my way, only yesterday, to avoid the necessity of passing his door? Alas! do the rich ever dream of the thousand barbed arrows of mortification which daily and hourly pierce the souls of the poor? I think not.

"Well," said Miss Bydexter, playing with the handle of her diamond-studded eye-glass, "she wasn't exactly a servant, you know, Mrs. Hadleigh: more of a companion. She read to me, and did my hair sweetly, and kept all my laces in such charming order. I shall never, never be able to replace Louise. I offered her fifty dollars to stay on with me, for I didn't know how on earth I was going to manage without her—just as I was going to New York, too. But she had got a pack of silly nonsense into her head about some young Frenchman or other that she wanted to marry. Marry, indeed! Such people haven't any business to marry, and I am sure Louise will live to repent it."

Thus Miss Cornelia Bydexter rattled on, quite certain that the trivialities of her daily life must possess deep interest for her auditors, for no one had ever ventured to tell the millionaire's daughter that she was a fool. I heard her without hearing, although I was listening all the time—the plan which had flashed into my head seemed so ridiculously visionary and yet so simple. And when she rose to take her leave I rose too, trembling slightly and clasping my hands nervously together.

"Papa," I began, "I—I have been thinking about it, and if you and mamma do not object—"

"Well?" Papa looked a little surprised, perhaps because it was so seldom that I ventured in his presence to express an opinion of my own.

"—I should so much like to go to New York with Cornelia!"

"You dear little thing!" said Miss Bydexter, smiling, and patting my hand with her mother-of-pearl-handled fan: "you will be exactly like a fairy princess."

Where the similarity existed nobody knew, nor did Miss Bydexter take the trouble to explain. She was accustomed to have people take her meaning for granted.

Mamma looked at me in a bewildered way, a soft reproach shining out of her eyes. I could read her face as if it were an open book. Before papa she dared not say out the truth: "We want the money for our rent! Oh, how can Octavia be so strangely forgetful of our household needs?"

"Very well," assented papa, in his grand Lord Chesterfield style. "Jeannette, bring me my desk. And fill that musty old standish with fresh ink. Do you hear, child?"

And while Jeannette, who knew that ink in our house was among the things that were, fluttered into the corner bakery to borrow a little out of the gray stone bottle that always stood on Mrs. Bailey's cash-desk, papa went on, talking loftily of the probable pleasures that I should enjoy in the great metropolis of the Western world.

"I am told that the coming season promises to be particularly brilliant in New York," said papa, graciously; "and I only wish, ladies"—with a stately bow toward Miss Bydexter, which would have done no discredit to "Deportment Turveydrop"—"that I was young enough to be your escort. Jeannette, you have been a long time bringing that ink; but nobody hurries themselves to perform my behests nowadays."

"Papa," pleaded poor Jeannette, turning red and white, "I went as quick as I could."

Papa did not notice her words, but with shaking hand, and many an unnecessary flourish, he drew the check for the last hundred and fifty dollars we had in the world until the next dividend day, six months off, should reinforce the fountain of Pactolus. And all to deceive Miss Bydexter, who wasn't deceived in the least.

"Here, my daughter," he said, folding it deliberately and handing it to me, while mamma looked on in breathless dismay, and Jeannette's eyes grew bigger and bluer than ever.

I followed Miss Bydexter down to the door, and the wheels of the big chocolate-colored Bydexter carriage were thundering off over the uneven pavement, when mamma came down also, looking pale and perturbed.

"Octavia, my daughter," she began, "how could you—"

"Hush, mamma!" I put my hands, with a little hysterical laugh, over the soft maternal lips. "Here is papa's check; do you suppose I would take it?"

"But," persisted mamma, looking, if possible, more bewildered than before, "I thought you were intent on going to New York?"

"So I am!"

"Then how—"

"Mamma, I am to have forty dollars a month. I am going as Cornelia's companion. Pshaw! why do I mince matters? I am going to be her maid, neither more nor less."

"Forty dollars a month." Mamma's faded eyes brightened. "But—Cornelia Bydexter's maid!" And her countenance fell again. I could not but smile.

"It will be no such terrible matter, after all, mamma. On the contrary, it will be fun. Cornelia is as good-natured as she can be, and you know very well I am an adept in hair-dressing and lace-mending and frill-fluting, thanks to the best of mammas, who knows every thing, and has taught her daughters the same!"

"But what would your papa say?" gasped mamma, hardly as yet realizing the conditions. I felt myself grow pale.

"Papa! But he must never know. We will keep our own counsel, mamma; you and I and Jeannette. All that he need be told is that I am going to New York with Cornelia Bydexter, and that is true enough."

And mamma took me lovingly into her arms.

"Octavia, ought we to ask this sacrifice from you?"

"Nobody asks it, mamma; it is my own free-will offering. And oh, mamma, I could not look Dr. Mortimore in the face when I remember that his bill has lain unpaid for six months!"

And mamma, also remembering this earnest and most incontrovertible of facts, had no more to say.

"It seems so strange!" said Miss Bydexter. "The idea of your being my maid, you dear little aristocratic-looking thing! And you used to write all my compositions for me at school, too! Dear, dear! only to think of it! Take care, Octavia, that bunch of curls comes in first under the braid, you know. And how came you ever to think of it?"

"Nonsense!" I cried, briskly. "The long and the short of it is that I want money and you do not—so don't let's say any more about it."

Papa talked vainglorioously of "my daughter in New York!" Poor papa! he had so little left to be vainglorious about. Mamma remained wisely silent, and Jeannette, who was addicted to hero-worship, firmly believed that her elder sister was the noblest girl in the world. While Dr. Mortimore—at least so I afterward heard—contracted his brows, and thought that people who could afford to send their daughters to pass a winter at the Grand Hotel might at least pay his very moderate bill.

The month of March was wearing itself away, and April sunshine was pencilling the sky with golden threads, interwoven with crystal lines of rain, when one day I astonished Dr. Mortimore by walking into his office. He looked up from his books in some surprise.

"Miss Hadleigh! I supposed you were in New York."

"I have returned with Miss Bydexter. Next week we go on to Washington."

Dr. Mortimore made no spoken answer, but there was a peculiar, inscrutable expression in his eyes. Was he thinking of mamma and Jeannette on the tread-mill of patient poverty at home? Was he fancying it a modern edition of Cinderella and the proud sisters? Involuntarily I spoke, with rising color and tremulous voice:

"You are entirely mistaken, Dr. Mortimore; but it is not my province to explain."

"I said nothing."

"But you looked a great deal."

"Please to interpret my looks," he said, with an amused face.

My cheeks burned, and I bit my lip to repress undignified anger. I laid down a pile of crisp, rustling bank-notes on the desk beside him.

"Be so kind as to receipt your bill, Sir."

He obeyed in silence, and I walked away, as he afterward told me, "with the air of an eighteen-year-old Semiramis." And—

[The rest of the MS. is in a bold, masculine handwriting, as different from Octavia Hadleigh's delicate up and down strokes as it is possible to imagine.]

—And, Octavia to the contrary notwithstanding, I shall take the liberty of finishing this confession after my own fashion.

I called that evening on Miss Bydexter. The fair Cornelia was jubilant.

"I never had a pleasanter season," she declared. "I haven't been ennuyée once. Octavia is such charming company."

"She is with you at present?"

"Oh yes. She's my maid, you know."

"Octavia Hadleigh!—your maid?"

I must have looked my astonishment, for I saw its reflex in Miss Bydexter's face.

"Why, to be sure. Didn't you know it?" And Miss Bydexter, who was no adherent to the theory that "silence is golden," poured out the whole story.

"Of course I wouldn't tell every one," she said, rather guiltily, as if remembering some hitherto forgotten charge of secrecy. "But I knew you would appreciate it—and she is so sweet, and they are so poor!"

"Is she at home?" I asked.

"No; she has gone around to her father's. But I expect her back every minute."

"I will go and meet her," said I. And I went accordingly, thinking, with a strange thrill at my heart, of that pompous, egotistic old father who sacrificed them all so regardlessly on the shrine of his selfish ease; and the pale, patient mother, and Octavia herself, the fairest and most dutiful of daughters. And I had believed her all this time to be a butterfly of fashion, forgetting utterly the piteous exigencies of her home.

When I first heard of her going to New York with Cornelia Bydexter I fully determined to put her away from my heart. Now I knew how impossible it would have been. I knew that I had loved her all the while I was "forgetting" so systematically. I met her in the rosy dusk, as stately as a princess, as beautiful as a flower.

"Octavia," I said, "I have misjudged you. Will you give me an opportunity to explain?"

"Certainly, Dr. Mortimore."

"But there is a question I should like you to answer first."

"What is it?"

"Will you be my wife, Octavia?" The question, asked in a lowered voice of intense suspense, was answered frankly, after a moment's hesitation.

"I will!"

I suppose I "explained" satisfactorily afterward, for Octavia understands all about it, but I really don't remember how or when it was done. But she is content, and that is enough.

Miss Bydexter had to look out for another "companion," and to this day old Mr. Hadleigh firmly believes that Octavia was one of the belles of New York society in the season of 186–.

And so she ought to have been.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE streets of Paris are almost impassable, clogged as they are at all hours by thousands of wagons loaded with bales and boxes reaching to the second story of the houses along the way. It is almost impossible to force an entrance into the stores, and the same thing is true of the theatres and other places of amusement. Decidedly Paris is on the road to convalescence. And such noise, such activity, such satisfaction on all faces, though sometimes this satisfaction has an ignoble origin. Foreigners, for instance, who crowd hither have been heard to exult in the downfall of that unrivaled city which has so long excited the envy of the whole world by her splendor, her artistic wealth, her exquisite taste, her inexhaustible wit, and her lavish and generous hospitality. This last virtue had degenerated into weakness. Nowhere was admission into society so easy as in the greater part of the Parisian salons. Strangers had the full freedom of the city; it was taken for granted that they were honorable and beyond reproach, and we eagerly did them the honors of the county, town, sea-ports, garrison towns, and archives without suspecting them of any possible evil designs. Suspicion without cause is not a trait of the French character, and it never occurred to us to see future enemies in our present guests. It has become necessary to retrench something of this generous trust, and there is reason to believe that French society in consequence will become a little more exclusive in future.

At this moment a struggle is going on between those who wish to break with the extravagance of the past and their rivals, who still cling to its follies, and are unwilling to learn wisdom from its teachings. But the general tendency is toward simplicity, in proof of which we quote a pretty dress which we have just seen, and which was designed for morning walks: Skirt of black alpaca, trimmed with nine folds, under the lower one of which was set a narrow pleated ruche of the same material. Black alpaca over-skirt, cut in large scallops on the bottom, and worked with black worsted, with no other trimming. High basque-waist of the same material, also scalloped and worked with worsted. For an outer garment, either a double cape of black cloth, a small paletot of black velveteen lined with fur, or a water-proof cloak may be worn with this suit, according to circumstances.

As to visiting dresses, the fashion fluctuates between the two classes of persons that we have mentioned. Those who wish to reform the fashions adopt demi-trained dresses with no other trimming, and wear with them either India shawls, folded three-cornered, as of old, or a handsome velvet wrapping, which forms at once the waist and over-skirt. On the other hand, those who are satisfied to take things as they are are preparing elaborate suits; skirt, draped over-skirt, and complicated waist of black velvet, richly embroidered with black soutache and silk galloon, with which they wear bonnets that call to mind the hats of the ex-grenadiers of the Imperial Guard. The first-named adopt a quieter style of bonnet, not so high, and with a sort of small cape and front, under which is seen a suspicion of a white illusion ruche.

Dinner and evening dresses are elegant, even when very plain. The beauty of evening dresses, as a rule, consists rather in the color than the costliness of the material used. A white, straw-color, light gray, blue, or pink dress, even of some inexpensive fabric, will be more effective in the evening than a dark velvet or satin. Light stuffs, therefore, such as foulard, crêpe de Chine, crape, or white Algérienne, with alternate satin and dead lustre stripes, will be much employed this season for evening toilettes. Cheap light silks will be trimmed with pleated flounces, ruches, and folds of white worsted grenadine, and even of white muslin, thus forming vaporous and elegant dresses, which will be far less expensive than heavy silks trimmed with rich lace, embroidery, or velvet.

The majority of the ball dresses will be made in the same style, with as much elegance and as little cost as possible. Instead of wearing tarlatan over silk, the latter will be worn over tarlatan. Large quantities of tarlatan have been manufactured, striped color upon color, white, citron, and other light shades; these will be used for under-skirts, with a profusion of trimmings, all of the inexpensive tarlatan; then over these skirts will be worn a silk tunic of the same or a harmonizing color. Much less material is needed for a tunic than an under-skirt. This tunic is made of faille, satin, or even of velvet. Over a white tarlatan skirt, for instance, is worn a tunic of pink faille, or of black velvet, trimmed with bright blue satin. The economy of this fashion is very evident; it demands neither a great quantity of costly material of the same color, nor even uniformity of hue, for not only can different fabrics be combined, but also contrasting colors. It is true that this style, above all others, requires the great discernment and correct taste which are found among our Parisian modistes, who possess the art of knowing how to stop in time—that is, precisely at the moment when the trimmings would be overloaded by the addition of a feather's weight, and when the varied colors harmonize exactly.

For several years past the stay in the country has been prolonged later and later; elegance is measured by the duration of this stay, and, provided that it were fashionable, the Parisians in high life would spend the winter in the woods and the summer in town. To know the fashions at the present time in Paris, it is necessary to be in the good graces of dress-makers obliging enough to permit one to inspect the contents of the trunks which they dispatch to châteaux all over France. This year, judging by the orders that they are filling, the stay in the country will be prolonged beyond any thing every known before. Invitations are out for the last fortnight in December in certain châteaux, and in one that I know a ball is to be given on New-Year's Eve. But we must forgive the young mistress of the house. She had been married but a week last year when her husband was forced to leave her, and shut himself up in Paris with the battalion of the Mobiles. For six months this bride of a week (she was scarcely eighteen) knew not whether she was a widow or her husband still living. During these six months she devoted herself to the sick and poor, nursing—not in name merely, but really—the small-pox patients of her village, where this terrible malady made fearful ravages, and only leaving her charges to go to church to pray. God listened to her prayers, and preserved her brave young husband. We can forgive her, therefore, for wishing to dance on New-Year's Eve. She is only eighteen!

I have seen a number of sketches that have been made for this ball, for the dresses are drawn in water-colors, to judge of the effect of the shades, before being made up. I will describe a few of the most striking of these for the benefit of my readers.

Dress of Prussian mauve faille, as light as possible, trimmed with white lace set on in irregular curves. Tunic, or rather cloud, of white tulle, trimmed with the same lace. This tunic, which is much longer in reality than the faille under-skirt, is draped, puffed, gathered, and, in short, diminished in the most ingenious manner, and trimmed with long branches of white clematis, looking like little stars. The same flowers in the hair, arranged as a wreath. Low waist and short sleeves. But as this dress is designed for a modest young lady, who would not appear in the décolletée costume of some of our modern dames, a compromise is effected by trimming the top of the waist with a sort of scarf of silk tulle, pleated under a small spray of clematis on each shoulder, in the middle of the front, and three times in the back; so that the waist has the appearance of being quite low without really being so.

Another dress has a skirt of citron tarlatan, trimmed the whole length with flounces pleated regularly like the petals of a dahlia. Tunic of bright garnet velvet, trimmed with bands of citron satin mixed with alternate rows of black and white lace. Low waist of the same velvet, worn over a high chemisette of pleated citron tarlatan edged with white lace. Under the short velvet sleeves are worn sleeves of citron tarlatan trimmed with pleated flounces. Three dahlias—one garnet, another citron, and the third garnet—were arranged as a diadem in the hair.

A third dress was of the palest gray faye, trimmed with pleated hemmed flounces of simple muslin. Tunic of the same muslin, hemmed on the bottom, and draped with large clusters of Bengal roses.

Another dress was of straw-colored faille, trimmed with flounces of white lace. Tunic of the same faille, edged with a fringe of white marabouts, and draped on each side by a large cluster of pink hydrangeas, mixed with white marabouts. Diadem, composed of white marabouts and hydrangea leaves, set on flat bandeaux, with the back hair braided, coiled, and mixed with a few curls.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

THE VALUE OF FICTION.

IT is interesting to mark the sudden rush with which the old Puritanical dislike for novels has collapsed, at last, in the present generation. It took a long time to destroy; but then it took a long time to grow. It sprang originally from a very pardonable protest against plays; this itself being due not so much to the dramatists of the Restoration, as to those of the later years of James I., the decadence of the Elizabethan drama. The suspicious hatred with which all works of imagination alike were regarded was strengthened by the free-and-easy morals of Smollett and Fielding, and not even lessened by the virtuous Richardson, who was looked upon as the single exception which proved the rule. And it went on spreading, till, like a vast cloud, it shut out altogether the sunshine of fancy and imagination from the dull homes of thousands, whose deadened thoughts turned upon themselves, and ate out their hearts in the gloom of a hopeless Calvinism, and a red brick-and-stucco civilization. There has been hard work to blow this cloud away, but it is done at last; and now, when not a single voice is lifted up against developing the imaginative faculty in men and women, we may perhaps ask ourselves what is likely to be the real gain to us from reading or writing works of fiction.

Unquestionably the chief gain is that it is good at times to get our minds away from ourselves. Life is mostly made up of little cares; in nine cases out of ten, cares arising from want of means; in the tenth case, often enough, from the spectre of some remote probability, conjured up by too much dwelling on contingencies. Little things become great things by being steadily looked at; and when society, change of scene, and lively companionship do not create a diversion, the mind may be, and often is, tortured almost to madness by imaginary horrors, the spectres of a morbid fancy. Consider the lives of most young girls in country towns. They should be painted of a dull gray color throughout, under a cloudy sky. Their recreations are principally lectures and croquet; they have an occasional dance; one or two of them marry; the rest settle down to a life which is one long repression of desires, till desires are killed outright. Desire of society; desire of change; desire of knowing the world, desire for that strange madness called love; desire of feeling, if only for once, the pulse quicken, and the blood course through the veins: all these have to be met in the face and sternly subdued, until, wearied with defeat, they rise no more. Into these lives comes the novel, like the dream of another world. Leaving the little narrow town, with its dreary street and woful monotony of emptiness, the mind travels far away to share in sorrows and joys alien to its own experiences—to feel the burst of life in action, and to smooth out its withered cheek to meet the kiss of love. Surely, if the novel were invented for no other purpose than to cheer the dull and purposeless lives of our women, it has done good work.

Consider, again, the fagged merchant, the barrister after a long term; worse, the physician when he gets a brief holiday: what is it not worth to him to sit idly and toy with the leaves of a novel, while the shadows shift on the hillsides, and the clouds chase each other on the sea? He is taken out from himself; while he is in another world, Nature, the restorer, is busily putting him to rights; and Imagination, the mesmerizer, charms him to sleep, to let the healing process go on.

This is fiction considered as an alterative. But it may be considered as a great educational power.

As dealing with different aspects of life, it teaches the nature of the world we live in. Ladies who read the Bazar do not often penetrate into the slums of the Five Points. Fagin and his tribe are as unknown to them as the Esquimaux. It is not, however, bad for ladies to know that such things exist. A knowledge of evil quà evil is not to be desired; but a knowledge of those forms of evil which can be remedied by money or self-denial is surely a good thing; and this the novel gives us. Moreover, if it is a good thing to know the different kinds of men and women there are—kinds which have as little affinity with one another as the Gibraltar monkey with the great gorilla; men and women who, if brought together, would have no one common topic of talk—these the novel shows us. And if it is a good thing to warn young men of the perils in their way, no sermons ever preached can have half the effect of the novel. Moreover, preachers of sermons have very seldom—certainly never since leaving college—encountered these perils. The novel sets them forth, giving them full dramatic effect. It shows the pitfall; the unwary youth hastening to take the fatal step; the ruin he brings on himself; the sorrow he brings on those who love him.

The so-called sensational novels generally turn upon some such catastrophe. Most of them show the downward progress of a character only weak at first, reckless at last. We see the man whose desires are beyond his means or his hopes, the struggles he undergoes to place himself in a better position, the temptation which prompts him by unlawful means to rise above his cares, his fall, and the infinitely greater cares that accompany it. In this class of novel we have, it is true, plenty of incident; but we have more—we have, condensed in a short space, and therefore intensified, all the sorrow and suffering that surround the fall of a man from his high estate of self-respect. Is it nothing to show to the world, in the most effective manner possible, that sin brings with it its own punishment, and that the most carefully protected secret of crime is liable to discovery by the simplest accident? The problem of suffering and sorrow is that which lies at the root of all novels: it forms the interest and pathos of every life. If a novel is but faithful to life, it can not but be wholesome in its effects, because it will be based on the great moral laws which govern the issues of life. I contend that a good "sensational" novel—honest and truthful, free from the false sensibility of the French school, the mawkish cant of the pietistic, the rubbish of the young-lady school—can produce, of itself, no harm. It is true that young ladies are more apt to laugh in church than to commit murders; but the novel is not written to warn ladies against murder. It is a record of men and women, the actual types of whom do exist, who belong to our own class of life, who elbow us in places of resort, and whose stories are sometimes narrated for the edification of the world in the newspapers, without the concomitant circumstances which explain or mitigate the guilt, and which may warn the reader. There never has been a time when the desire for what money will bring has been a more ready prompter to evil, or has called for more clear warning, than the present. Since the theatre has retired from the post of educator, for example, and the young men of the day decline to attend the gratuitous education by precept which is provided regularly every Sunday, it is surely a good thing that the novel should step in. Fiction has, farther, this advantage for the writer: suppose, by dint of contemplating a man's character, as shown in his letters, his writings, his talk, his daily bearing, an intending biographer arrives at the discovery of the kind of man his hero wished to be, or to be thought. This gives him a sort of key-note to his history. He can, by bringing out all those traits which belong to this side of his character, and suppressing all the rest, produce exactly the effect desired—at the expense of honesty. This is how all biographies, except Boswell's, seem to have been written. The writer describes his man as he thinks he wished to be considered. It does not at all follow that he was that kind of man; and presently facts are stated and theories broached which contradict the biographer from beginning to end.

Not so the novelist. He sees in A the rudimentary conception of a character which A—like his fellows, generally a weak sort of creature, who drifts—has not the power or the will to carry on. The novelist takes the character, and puts it into the person of an imaginary man who has the will, and he then follows it up to its legitimate consequences. Thus we get John Halifax (a beautiful life, which no biography could give us), Colonel Newcome, Frank Leigh, and a thousand creations which are as real to us as our brothers and sisters, whom we love twice as well, and who teach us ten times as much.

A great deal more might be said, but it suffices. Fiction lessens our anxieties by preventing that perpetual brooding which magnifies them; it brightens our real world by giving us an ideal one—more happy, more varied, more joyous, richer, and fuller than our own; it teaches us tolerance by showing us the different ways in which our fellows live; and it perpetually, under a thousand new forms, impresses the good old maxim, that the "only way to be happy is by the narrow road."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A CONSTANT READER.—Moiré antique and watered silk are no longer fashionable. The apron-polonaise continues in fashion; the Marguerite is the favorite of the season, and the stylish model for cashmere. Make your purple silk with demi-train, short over-skirt, and basque. Lace capes will still be worn over velvet garments.

ETTAH.—Wear a black cashmere polonaise with your colored dresses.

JENNIE.—Put corded silk collar and facings on your cloth cloak for mourning.

MRS. M. E. H.—Get all-wool plaids and merino for your little girl. Make by cut paper patterns of girls' dresses illustrated in Bazar. Many patterns of aprons have been given in Supplements.

JOHN M.—The copying wheel, sent from this office on receipt of 25 cents, is the only instrument we have for sale.

A TROUBLESOME FRIEND.—Put a Swiss muslin pleated flounce around your silk skirt, with black velvet bows for heading. Then make a Marguerite polonaise of Swiss muslin, with pleatings and bows for trimming.

MRS. P. B.—Directions for making skeleton leaves were given in Bazar No. 30, Vol. II. We do not answer by mail, or republish what we have once given.

MRS. F. T. H.—Your samples of lace are very fair German guipure. Use the vest-basque and over-skirt pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 41, Vol. IV., for your velveteen. Trim with a silk fold and fringe.

MISS S. J. L.—We know nothing of the model you mention.

MRS. E. C. M.—We do not send patterns until they are paid for, and we have no cut paper pattern for velvet cloak that will only require three yards. You will have to use one of the short sacque or double cape patterns given in the Supplement. Trim with fringe and passementerie, or else merely put a cord on the edge. We do not reply by mail.

C. J. F.—Your Marguerite pattern will do for a water-proof suit. Use no flounces, but put a thick cord in curled rows near the edge of skirt and polonaise, and cord and tassels instead of bows behind.

A VILLAGE GIRL.—Make a polonaise of black empress cloth to wear with your gray dress. The trimming is well enough.

MOLLIE.—For trimming lower skirts read New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 41 and 42, Vol. IV.

H. B.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 41, Vol. IV., for trained dresses.

MARY.—Back numbers of Harper's Weekly can be ordered from this office.

W. C.—"Harper's Hand-Book of Travel" will be useful to you.

D. G.—There is no fixed rule in this matter. Stationers say the groom pays for wedding-cards quite as often as the bride does; but the Bazar's idea is that the bride's parents would prefer to pay for invitations sent from their own house quite as naturally as for the cake they offer guests.

FRANCES L.—We do not know.

MRS. M.—Get a London smoke, empress, or Biarritz cloth suit, and make with Marguerite polonaise. Get gray merino for dressing-gown, and trim with cherry.

STOUT LADY.—We have no cut paper pattern for cloaks especially, but commend the Louis XIV. vest-polonaise or double-breasted sacque for that purpose.

MRS. C.—A serviceable suit for traveling in November would be ladies' cloth, made with Marguerite polonaise. For your little girl get a water-proof pelisse to wear over her ordinary dresses.

UGLY GIRL.—Ask for lettuce soap at any large drug store or perfumer's. It is 75 cents a cake, of the smallest size.

TILLIE VAN D.—Muriatic acid of 60 per cent. strength, diluted in twelve times as much water, will destroy superfluous hair. It must be used with great care, or it will burn the skin. Understand that we do not advise its use in any case. Your friend has a unique beauty in "the double charm of wedded brows," and will be very absurd to disturb them.

UGLY GIRL OF LEXINGTON.—Apply preparations for freckles as often a day as you like, leaving them till dry, and follow the process a week, or till the skin is clear.

DAISY.—Cosmetics have no influence on a "muggy" complexion. Brisk exercise and sunshine alone can do that any good. Dance, run, sweep, to put the blood in fast circulation. Keep out-of-doors three hours a day.

MILDRED.—Palafox was the Spanish general who conducted the siege of Saragossa against the Emperor Napoleon.—You will find a sketch of Mrs. Browning's life prefixed to her works.

DOT.—Indian ink is to be had at any artist's supply shop. Rub it with a few drops of water on a palette or saucer till thick enough for painting. It will wash off, however, and must be renewed daily. Apply with a small hair-pencil.

A FRIEND OF THE BAZAR.—The juice of cucumbers in skim-milk is said to promote the growth of hair where wanted. Sulphate of quinine improves its growth; if not dissolved in too strong an acid, it is harmless. So says medical authority.

T.—We know of no certain means of preserving your rare flower. You had better have it painted, or copied in wax.

GUPPY.—State Normal Schools are instituted for the training of teachers, and therefore it is only honorable that those who have profited by them should carry out their design; but we do not think that there is any obligation in the matter beyond a moral one, or that young ladies educated therein are bound to teach until they are married.

PRESTO.—A gentleman should not call on a lady socially without being invited to do so, or asking permission. In introductions always present the gentleman to the lady. Young girls wear their hair flowing both in the street and the house, but the style is essentially juvenile. An intimate acquaintance only can warrant a lady in exchanging pictures or corresponding with a gentleman.

SISSY.—Our patterns of tidies are like the sands of the sea-shore in number, as you must know if you have read the Bazar regularly since the beginning.—We can not undertake a commentary on the "Cryptogram," the meaning of which seems to us obvious enough for any one's comprehension.

T. F.—There are a number of second-hand bookstores in New York, among which Sabin's, Philes's, and J. W. Bouton's are the most prominent.

DEARBORN, ROGER, & CO.—In preparing MSS. for press write on one side of the paper only, numbering each written page in order, and send it flat by mail, for nothing is more vexatious to an editor than a rolled MS. Write legibly, with lines at a convenient distance apart. You can tack the pages together for better security. As you may not always be certain whether you are writing to a gentleman or a lady, "To the Editor of ——" would be a better form of address than "Mr. Editor." And do not expect a verdict by the following mail, as there may be scores before you with equal claims to attention.

MARY M'N. AND J. B. D.—We do not know the value of the coin in your possession. You had better consult a professional numismatist.

FRANK B. R.—You can probably dispose of your books through the booksellers mentioned in the answer to "T. F."

MISS G.—A mantle the shape of the pattern you send us is now considered stylish, and we advise you not to change it. We do not reply by mail.

HELEN.—Kilt pleats are cut straight, not bias, and do not require a foundation net lining unless the material is very thin.

LENA E. R.—We have not given the embroidery pattern you want. Any fancy store will prepare it for you. We do not give addresses here.

MRS. J. M. S.—We do not know where you can obtain the stamps mentioned.

H.—The soutache you want is merely narrow black silk braid. We do not know the quantity required.

Knitted Loop Stitch.

THIS stitch, which is used for the Knitted Cape on this page, is shown by the illustration, Fig. 1, page 749. Knit, going backward and forward, with wooden needles, not too fine; make the foundation of the requisite length, and knit the 1st round plain. The 2d round is a loop round. In this round slip the first st. (stitch), pass the needle through the second st., loop the double thread on the needle, then again on the needle and at the same time on the forefinger of the right hand, then again on the needle, and draw the threefold st. through. In this manner work each of the st. next following as shown by the illustration, and knit off the last st. without a loop, so that there are two loop tassels less than the number of foundation st. Knit the 3d round plain; in doing this it is well to keep the loops of an even length by means of an inserted mesh. Then follows another loop round in the manner described, so that the loop rounds are thus always separated by one round knit plain.

Crochet Stitches.

THESE crochet stitches are shown by illustration, Figs. 2 and 3, page 749. The Tunisian crochet stitch, also called Victoria crochet stitch, which is shown by Fig. 2, is worked in rounds, going backward and forward, each two rounds forming one pattern row. On a foundation crochet the 1st round (from right to left).—On each st. (stitch) 1 st., which remains on the needle for a loop. 2d round (casting-off round, from left to right).—Each loop st. of the preceding round is cast off separately, throw the thread over as shown by Fig. 2, draw it through the next 2 st., and so on. In each repetition of the 1st round work the new loops of stitches on the vertical st. of the preceding round, always passing the needle through above the horizontal row of stitches.

The crochet stitch, Fig. 3, is a variation of the stitch shown by Fig. 10 on the same page, and is only distinguished from the latter by the double and wave stitches, which do not run in straight lines, but are transposed. Thus, in order to form a double stitch, pass the needle through a wave stitch st. instead of a double stitch of the preceding pattern row, and from the double stitches always take up single stitches. This stitch is used for the Crochet Jacket with Short Sleeves shown on page 740.

Knitted Foundation for Shawls, Scarfs, etc.

THIS foundation, which is shown by illustration, Fig. 8, page 749, is especially adapted for shawls which are to be worn as mantelets, as shown by the illustration on this page. Knit the foundation with split zephyr worsted or Shetland wool and coarse steel or fine wooden knitting-needles, in rounds going backward and forward, as follows: Make a foundation corresponding to the size desired for the shawl; it must be divisible by 6, as the pattern figure, which is constantly repeated, requires six stitches; but for the close side edges of the knitted part cast on several st. (stitches) more. 1st round.—1 sl. (stitch slipped), 2 k. (stitches knit plain), * once t. t. o. (thread thrown over), k. 3 st. together (knit together), once t. t. o., 3 k., repeat from *, 3 k. at the end of the round. In the following rounds we shall make no further reference to repeating from *, which is a matter of course. 2d round.—1 sl., 2 p. (stitches purled), * once t. t. o., 1 p., once t. t. o., 5 p.; 4 p. at the end of the round. 3d round.—1 sl., 3 k., * once t. t. o., drop the thread thrown over of the preceding round from the needle, k. 1 crossed (knit crossed; that is, knit off the st. reversed), once t. t. o., drop the thread thrown over of the preceding round from the needle, 5 k.; 4 k. at the end of the round. 4th round.—1 sl., 3 p., * once t. t. o., drop the thread thrown over of the preceding round from the needle, 1 p. crossed, once t. t. o., drop the thread thrown over from the needle, 5 p.; 4 p. at the end of the round. 5th–10th rounds alternately like the 3d and 4th rounds. 11th round.—1 sl., 1 k., k. 2 st. together, * once t. t. o., drop the thread thrown over of the preceding round from the needle, 1 k. crossed, once t. t. o., drop the thread thrown over from the needle, k. 2 st. together, 1 k., k. 2 st. together; at the end of the round k. 2 st. together and 2 k. 12th round.—1 sl., p. 2 together, * t. t. o. once, 3 p., t. t. o. once, k. 3 st. together; at the end of the round k. 2 st. together and 1 p. 13th round.—1 sl., 1 k., * t. t. o. once, 1 sl., k. 2 st. together, draw the sl. over, t. t. o. once, k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. once, 1 k., 2 k. at the end of the round. 14th round.—1 sl., 1 p., *t. t. o. once, k. 2 st. together, 1 p., k. 2 st. together, t. t. o. once, 1 p.; at the end of the round 2 p. This completes one pattern figure of the foundation.

CROCHET FICHU WITH BELT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Fig. 49.

Crochet Border.

THIS border, which is shown by Fig. 10, page 749, and is used for the trimming of Crochet Fichu, page 744, is worked with black split zephyr worsted, and consists of insertion edged with lace. The lace and insertion may be worked separately or together. Make the foundation lengthwise, and for the insertion work the 1st round.—Always alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 2 ch. (chain stitch), with the latter pass over 2 foundation st. (stitch). 2d round.—Like the 1st round, the dc. always on the ch. of the preceding round. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 sc. (single crochet), 9 ch., with the latter pass over 5 st. 4th round.—* 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, 9 ch., 1 sc. on the middle st. of the following ch. scallop, on the following 9 st. 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 2 dc., 3 stc. (short treble crochet), 2 dc., 1 sdc.; 1 sc. on the next st., 9 ch., and repeat from . 5th round.— 1 sc. on the middle st. of the next ch. scallop, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the middle of the 3 stc. of the preceding round, 5 ch.; 1 sc. on the next ch. scallop, 5 ch., and repeat from *. 6th round.—Always alternately 1 dc., 2 ch., with the latter pass over 2 st. of the preceding round.

For the lace, either make a separate foundation, or, if preferred, crochet, observing the illustration, Fig. 9, page 749, which shows a full-sized section of the insertion joined with the lace. 1st round.—1 sc. on the next foundation st., * 8 ch., pass over 2 dc., 1 sc. on the next foundation st., 15 ch., pass over 1 dc., 2 sc. separated by 17 ch. on the next 2 foundation st., 15 ch., pass over 1 dc., 1 sc. on the next foundation st., 8 ch., pass over 2 dc. Repeat from . 2d round.— On the first ch. scallop of the preceding round 1 sc., 6 ch., 1 sc. on each of the next 3 scallops, after the first 2 sc. 8 ch. each, after the third sc. 6 ch., 1 sc. on the next scallop 2 ch. Repeat from . 3d round.— 1 dc. on the first scallop consisting of 6 ch., 7 ch., 2 dc. on the following scallop, 9 ch., 2 dc. on the following scallop, 7 ch., 1 dc. each on the following two scallops, but without working any stitches between these dc. Repeat from *.

Crochet Stitch.

THIS stitch, which is shown by the illustration, Fig. 10, page 749, is also used for the Crochet Fichu, page 744. On a foundation of the required length work one pattern row in the common Tunisian crochet stitch; and then, in taking up the stitches for the next row, proceed in the following manner: * Again pass the needle from the front through the next foundation st. (stitch), draw one loop through, take the st. taken up from the same foundation st. in the first pattern row on the needle also, and through these two st. draw a loop, which remains on the needle. Take up the following st. from the next vertical st. of the first pattern row, in doing which pass the needle through the st. from the under side as in the wave stitch. Repeat from *, so that on the preceding pattern row always alternately one single sunken wave stitch and one raised open double st. are formed; on the needle, however, there must be only single loops which are cast off separately in the usual manner. In a similar manner take up the st. for the following pattern row, passing the needle, in order to form the double st., from the front through the double st. of the pattern row before the last, and proceed in the manner above described, then again form a wave stitch, forming raised rows of stitches, similar to knitted stitch, and separated by a wave stitch.

Crochet Border for Hoods, Capes, Jackets, etc.

THIS border, which is shown by illustration, Fig. 12, is used both for trimming and binding, and forms a thick roll. It is used for the Crochet Jacket with Basque, shown on page 748, and consists of a foundation of single crochet (six stitches wide) worked crosswise with white worsted in rounds, going backward and forward, always passing the needle through underneath both upper veins of the stitches of the preceding round. The trellis-like double crochet pattern, which rests loosely on the foundation, is commenced in the 4th round. Thus crochet in the 4th round.—1 sc. (single crochet), throw the thread over twice and work 1 stc. (short treble crochet), which is fastened to a stitch in the middle between the 1st and 2d rounds, so that the stc. stretches over two rounds in a slanting direction. Pass over the next st. (stitch) of the preceding round, work 1 sc. each on the following 2 st., then 1 stc. on the same vein of the st. between the 1st and 2d rounds, 1 sc. on the last st. of the preceding round, as a transition to the net round 1 ch. (chain stitch). 5th round.—6 sc., 1 ch. 6th round.—2 sc., 1 stc., which is fastened to the first stc. of the 4th round; before working off the stc., however, work a second in the opposite direction, in connection with the second stc. of the 4th round as shown by the illustration, work off the last loops together, and work 2 more sc., 1 ch. 7th round.—6 sc., 1 ch., then repeat from the 4th round. After finishing the crochet-work, sew a black dot in each double crochet diamond as shown by the illustration.

Crochet Stitch for Jacket with Short Sleeves.

THIS crochet stitch, which is used for the Jacket with Short Sleeves shown on page 740, in order to show to advantage, should be worked in two colors, and is therefore more suitable for trimming than for complete foundations. It is thickly ribbed crosswise, alternating with one wave stitch row and one row of double stitches side by side. Work on the foundation a common Tunisian pattern row of a brown color (not too dark) and cast off with double worsted by adding a second thread of the same color. The ends of the thread must always be crocheted on in the following pattern row. For this following (second) pattern row take a lighter color or white, take up the stitches from the under side as in wave stitch, so that the preceding pr. (pattern row) forms a waved stitch row, and cast off the stitches singly. On the white Tunisian row just completed work with the same color another round from right to left in the following manner: Pass the needle from the front again through the next brown stitch, on which the next stitch of the white row has been worked, draw a loop through, take the corresponding white stitch of the preceding row also on the needle for a double st. (stitch), and through all of the 3 st. on the needle draw one loop, working them together like a single crochet. Proceed in a similar manner with all the remaining stitches, so that a double stitch row, finished at the top with a chain stitch edge, is formed. Cut off the worsted thread, fasten the last st., and work again with the darker color one Tunisian pr. cast off with double worsted; in taking up the stitches always pass the needle from the front through the front upper chain stitch vein of a double st. In taking up the stitches for the following white p.r., again pass the needle through the brown stitches from the under side, so that a wave stitch row is again formed.

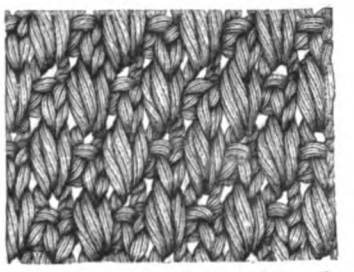

Fig. 3.—CROCHET STITCH FOR BASQUE.—[See Page 740.]

SPRAY-WORK.

INCOMPARABLY the best method of doing spray-work is to diffuse the paint by a spray-diffuser, for which purpose any ordinary sprinkler with fine perforations may be used, care being taken to sprinkle steadily. By this means a marvelous delicacy of shading may be obtained, and the work made almost as beautiful as an exquisite lithograph.

Spray-work that will wash may be prepared as follows: A pennyworth of logwood chips, a piece of copperas the size of a walnut, and half an ounce of gum, boiled in a quart of water and strained. If too dark, more water can be added, and the color can be rendered more or less blue with more or less copperas. The articles should be washed carefully, with soap boiled to a jelly, in lukewarm water in which some gum has been melted. The less they are rubbed the better. The gum is to glaze and stiffen. A detailed description of this kind of work will be found in Harper's Bazar, Vol. I., No. 34, page 535.

"This charming novel is Mrs. Stowe's latest and, in many respects, most thoughtful and complete book. It is eminently a 'Book for the times,' and giving, as it does, Mrs. Stowe's individual ideas about the much vexed Woman Question, including marriage, divorce, suffrage, legislation, and all the rights claimed by the clamorous, is spicy enough even for this wearied newspaper age. It has already excited widespread interest; so much so that English publishers have arranged for its issue in Great Britain, and it is also in course of translation into French, German, and Swedish. It is a book which, treating of exciting topics in Mrs. Stowe's own charming style, with a large share of 'Beecher sense' and characteristic touches of fancy, sparkling dialogue, and merry humor, will be eagerly sought for."

We make only one style, and have but one price for our Pianos, which are all made from thoroughly seasoned and kiln-dried materials, and have seven octaves—rosewood case—carved legs and lyre—large square grand overstrung scale—front round corners—serpentine bottom—iron plate—French action—and are all warranted five years. We have no agents, and allow no commissions or discounts to any one. This explains how we can sell a good Piano for $290, which is about the price Piano dealers pay to manufacturers for instruments similar to ours. Piano dealers are allowed by all manufacturers, except ourselves, to add 100 per cent., and upward, profit to all sales. This the public can prove by investigation to be strictly true. Piano dealers, teachers, professors, and everybody else, are excluded from any and every possibility of a single cent of commission on our Pianos. If you wish a Piano sent for trial, you must make the matter of reference and payment unquestionable; and if the instrument is in any respect inferior to any Piano made in the known world at any price, you may send it back to us at the end of ten days' trial, instead of paying for it. If you order a Piano sent, we have one request to make; and that is, that the trial shall be made by parties who are not interested in other Pianos. Please send for our Circulars containing full particulars and references to bankers, merchants, and families, in thirty-five States and Territories, who are using our Pianos. Address or apply to the

The works of the Gorham Company are very extensive, enabling them to employ the most accomplished talent in designing, skill in producing, and the best labor-saving machinery and method of manufacture, thus reducing the cost and bringing these beautiful wares within the reach of almost every purchaser.

The standard of this Silver is that of British Sterling, 925-1000.

United States Money Orders.

THE GRAPHIC Illustrated Weekly Paper can now be supplied regularly to every part of the United States by sending direct to the Office, in London, a Money Order (which can now be obtained in any town in the United States and Canada).

One Year's Subscription, One Pound Sixteen Shillings. This will include the Christmas and all Extra Numbers published.

A Free Copy as specimen will be sent on application.

Means will be taken that the papers shall be delivered free from injury every week, so that the number will not only be of interest at the moment, but, bound into Volumes, become a handsome Book for the Drawing-room Table.

The extraordinary success of THE GRAPHIC in Europe is due in a great measure to the number and high quality of its illustrations, drawn by a number of distinguished Painters, many of whom have hitherto held aloof from pictorial publications. The reputation THE GRAPHIC has now obtained has been also assisted by the number of its artists and correspondents in all parts of the world, thus making the journal of interest to all.

The money order must be made payable to

WEBSTER'S PATENT

BUTTON-HOLE WORKERS.

Patented June 27, 1871.

One of the most important inventions of the age!
The most perfect Button-Hole Worker ever invented!

So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes, and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction.

The most liberal inducements offered to the trade.

Dry-Goods and Fancy-Goods Merchants find it an excellent selling article.

Local and traveling agents wanted every where.

Samples and terms, with full directions for use, sent prepaid on receipt of 50 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns,

For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 28 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 30 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 10 to 16 years of age, and for children of both sexes under 10. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a list of two valuable premiums, both of which are offered to subscribers for Harper's Bazar. One subscriber will get at least one of these premiums, and we confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premiums offered to each and every new subscriber for the Bazar have no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land. For terms to Agents, or for catalogues, address

JAMES M'CALL & CO.,

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work (not sewing) furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars on receipt of stamp. Address

Ladies' House and Street Dresses.

See Illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—PLAIN-WAIST HOUSE DRESS (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). In compliance with numerous requests from those of our readers who prefer plain waists to the basques and polonaises so much worn, we give this week a pattern of a stylish suit of this kind, copied from a new and elegant Paris model, and consisting of a beautifully fitting plain waist, apron-front over-skirt, and walking skirt. The original is of gray cashmere, trimmed with folds and pleatings of the material and fringe of the same color. The waist is lengthened at the bottom, and the skirt is worn over it, so as to avoid the unsightly gap between the waist and skirt in case of the slipping of the latter, a precaution which is much needed, now that the skirt and waist are seldom if ever sewed together. The over-skirt is draped gracefully at the sides under a Watteau fold. The skirt is slightly longer than the ordinary walking skirt, just touching the ground in the back. Belt with sash ends, trimmed with folds and fringe.

The pattern is furnished in nine even sizes, from 30 to 46 inches, bust measure. To take the size, pass a tape measure entirely around the body, under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest, drawing it rather tightly. This is the only measure required. If the bust measure is an odd size, always send for the next size larger; for instance, if it is 37 inches, send for 38 inches, and in making it up take deeper seams than are allowed in the pattern.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises four articles—plain waist, apron-front over-skirt, walking skirt, and sash end of belt.

PLAIN WAIST.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, back, and sleeve. The front of the waist is fitted by two darts on each side. The back is fitted with side forms, which extend to the middle of the armhole. The back can be made either whole or with a seam through the middle. In the latter case, the two lines of perforations in the middle are cut out, and the back is seamed up to the neck. If made without a seam, the V is taken up in the lining only, the same as the V on the shoulder. The material is extended three inches below the waist line, and is left open on the hips. The perforations show the length of the waist. The neck is cut high, and finished with a cord. The waist is closed down the front with ten buttons and button-holes. A row of stitching on each side of the button-holes finishes the front. The half-flowing sleeves are sewed into the armholes plain. They are left open at the outside seam about eight inches above the bottom, and are trimmed with fringe three inches wide surmounted by a fold two inches wide of the material, which is edged with gros grain of the same color. The perforations show where to baste up the seams on the shoulders and under the arms, to take up the darts, to take up the V in the middle of the back, to baste the side forms, the length of the waist, and the size and shape of the under part of the sleeve. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back the hem in front. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all other seams. Baste up and try on wrong side out before sewing. If alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. If the sleeves are too long or short, take from or add an equal quantity at the top and bottom, keeping the same shape.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 3 yards.
Quantity of fringe, 2 yards.
Quantity of gros grain, cut on the bias, an eighth of a yard.
Buttons, 10.

APRON-FRONT OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in five pieces—apron front, side gore for the front, back breadth, side gore for the back, and Watteau fold for the side. Only half the pattern is given. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid making a seam. Cut the two front gores, the two side gores for the back, and the Watteau folds for each side laid lengthwise of the goods. The back edge of the front side gore is laid in four side pleats turning upward two inches below the top. The front edge of the back gores is laid in three deep pleats turning upward two inches below the top. Then double the Watteau fold, bring the two notches evenly together, and place it between the side seams, even with the corresponding notches at the top. Two inches above the lower edge of the side seams and fold are three notches; bring them evenly together, and sew the seam; then sew all the seams of the skirt, and lay the fold evenly with the lines of perforation, thus forming the Watteau fold. Cut an opening in the middle of the back breadth at the top eight inches long, and hem it for the lap. The front and side gores are sewed plain on the belt. The gores on each side of the back breadth are laid in small side pleats turning backward. The back breadth is gathered and sewed to the belt, which laps in the back. Cut two tapes twelve inches long, and tack them to the belt on each side of the opening, and to the skirt at the perforations. Put the pattern together by the notches to prevent mistakes. The notches on the side seams show where to lay the pleats. The perforations show how to form the fold, and where to tack the tapes in the back. The over-skirt is trimmed with fringe three inches deep, surmounted by a fold two and a half inches wide edged with gros grain.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 4½ yards.
Quantity of fringe, 4 yards.
Quantity of gros grain, cut on the bias, a quarter of a yard.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front gore, one side gore, and three straight breadths for the back. Only half the pattern is given. The front and side gores are sewed to the belt plain. The full breadths are gathered and sewed to the belt. The skirt is trimmed with a kilt pleating twelve inches wide, surmounted by a row of fringe three inches deep, and a fold two and a half inches wide edged with gros grain. If the skirt is too long or too short, take from or add to the bottom, always keeping the same shape.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.
Extra for trimming, 5½ yards.
Quantity of fringe, 4½ yards.
Quantity of gros grain, cut on the bias, a quarter of a yard.

SASH END FOR THE BELT.—Cut two pieces like the pattern given, and sew on the belt with the over-skirt. A flat bow, or loops of the material, are set above the sash ends. Trim with fringe, folds, and gros grain piping.

Fig. 2.—STREET DRESS. Skirt of blue faille, trimmed with flounces of the material. Black and white striped poplin over-skirt, edged with a black silk ruche edged on each side with white lace, and black and white fringe. Blue faille vest. Basque-waist of the material of the over-skirt, and trimmed in the same manner. Black velvet hat, with white feather.

Fig. 3.—DINNER DRESS. Maroon Irish poplin dress, trimmed with folds and scallops of the material.

FAMILY STEALING.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

I HAVE just been reading the story of a little girl who was alienated for life from her father because he made her wear two figs strung around her neck to punish her for having stolen them from the dinner-table. How great was her sin, or how incommensurate the punishment, history furnishes us no aggravating or extenuating circumstances by which to judge; but I desire to protest against the unwisdom and injustice of calling such an act stealing, or of assuming for a moment that there can be any such thing as stealing between parents and little children. It may be disobedience, and if not suppressed, it may lead to theft—but theft it is not; and if it were, I would not let a child think so. There are pitfalls enough for his little soul to stumble into without leading him out of his path to throw him into one that he would never have found of himself.

Every thing that tends to create a division of interests between parents and children should be discouraged. Every thing that tends to create unity should be fostered. It is never too early to make a child feel his ownership of home—not the ownership of tyranny and selfishness, but of affection and attachment. Let him have his share of the proprietorship in all its comforts, conveniences, and luxuries. I do not know what the law would say, but they are his. The rights of a child are the strongest in the world. His absolute inability to defend them throws an immense burden upon grown-up people. He owns every thing he is born to. The wealth of his father is his by divine right. All that his parents can do—what they are strictly bound to do—is to pass over his property to him in such measure, by such means, as shall be most for his welfare. To talk of his stealing figs from his father's table is absurd. The table is his, figs, father, and all. He must keep his little hands off, because it is not good manners to put them on, because he will get his fingers sticky and soil his frock, because the time for figs is not yet, and he must not take his till Kate and Mary and Frank have theirs; but not in the least because the figs belong to somebody else, and not him. And if his little confused, fumbling, twilight soul half thinks it is stealing, does not rightly know the difference, soothe away the vagueness, or hush it away by silence. One sin at a time is enough for him to be saddled with. If he has been ordered not to touch the figs, there is a clear case of disobedience. Let it stand out by itself, not be mixed in with something else. If nothing has ever been said to him about it, wherein does his fault consist? But children are such conscientious little wretches that they will often show signs of guilt when a wise man will be puzzled to define it. The part of wisdom is not to multiply iniquities, but to diminish them. Bessie had got into a habit—a mere habit—of waking up in the night and going to her mother's room. Presently her mother told her she must not come into her room again unless she was sick. The very next night I was awakened, and aware of a little midget pawing rapidly over the head of my bed with speechless but ferocious resolution, and down snuggled Bessie, not half awake, and in a minute not even that. In the morning, and in the full possession of her senses, conscious crime gnawed at Bessie's heart, and when she heard her mother's step coming in search of her she for an instant contemplated concealment. But her mother was wise enough to pass it over slightly, and it was with great relief that Bessie bounced up after she was gone, and cried, "She didn't care a bit!"

And Bessie was not the least harmed by it, though that evil and bitter thing, "a strict disciplinarian," might have made out a first-class case of disobedience and evasion. It was nothing of the sort. It was strict obedience and admirable invention, showing a fertility of resource while half asleep that promised well for future usefulness when wide awake.

It seems to me it is always best to make out as little sin as possible; to assume as much good intent as possible; to attribute innocent motives, and call a child good for the sake of inducing him to become so; to dispense with rules, and not make much ado about nothing. Why should a parent be constantly coming out with a flat-footed command, and bringing his will face to face with his child's? It is sometimes, doubtless, unavoidable, but it is not very often. Children, as a general thing, do not need to be ordered about, or to be kept back with a sword. They are amenable to the law written in their hearts. They learn very early to understand the relations of figs and cake, and pie and preserves, if they are treated like reasonable beings and interested friends. But if they are put under ban; if no confidence is reposed in them, and no discretion is expected of them; if their constitutional government is simply "you shall" and "you shall not;" if they are made to go in leading-strings, and dainties are locked away from them, and every thing is the property of their parents, and they have no rights in the sugar-bowl and jam-pot which their elders are bound to respect, but stand on the same footing with the beggar-boy in the streets—why, it would be very strange if they should not steal the figs; and were the case left to me, I should make the father wear them around his neck, and draw the string tight.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Bottom's Ears.

MY DEAR LEO,—I hope that you have walked a great deal in this superb autumn weather, keeping your eyes and ears and mind open, for there seems to be no season of the year in which the human frame is in such equable play. Coleridge speaks of the sadness of the spring and of the autumn, and thinks the last to be the deeper. But I find myself musing, as I stroll through the Ramble in the Park, that to a man of experience the melancholy of a hope that can not be fulfilled is not less than that of apparent decay. Yet I will not suffer myself to follow Coleridge—indeed, those who have attempted it have often suffered—for it is of a very different subject that I wish to speak to you. It is, indeed, true that I was thinking of that remark of Coleridge the other day as I sat sunning myself in a pleasant path, and Claudio joined me and told me the morning's news. I don't know why we spoke of Shakespeare, but we did, although it was only eleven o'clock in the day and in a pleasure park of the great city. The circumstances were as incongruous as reading Homer in Saint Rainbow's.

My companion said that of all the conceits in the great poet nothing seemed to him more purely ludicrous than the caressing love of Titania for Bottom with the ass's ears; and he smiled as if freshly amused by the comic thought. But it seems to me the most natural thing in the world. Shakespeare held up the mirror, and what is so common and so obvious as those ears upon Bottom? Claudio looked at me askance, but, as I saw somebody approaching, I remarked that we could now test the point, for, unless I was greatly mistaken, I saw Bottom coming with Titania upon his arm. Apparently there were only a gentleman and lady sauntering along the path, but I had recognized Piccolo and his bride—a simple, amiable, pleasant pair, over whom the nuptial benediction had very recently been spoken.

We watched them as they approached. It was not, indeed, a wood near Athens in which we were; and it was not a midsummer's night, but an autumn morning. Yet no Greek pair in fact or fable were ever sincerer lovers, or saw more beauty in the world, or felt more joy in life and in each other. We all love lovers, as we do children, with a good-natured fondness; and it is because love itself is immortal youth, and they who love never really grow old. What honest simplicity they show! and it is not ridiculous, although we smile. Indeed, one of my pleasures in this great town is sometimes to breakfast at the newest and finest hotel, whither the young votaries of Hymen from out of town always hie, and observe the pretty ways of the bright-plumaged bridal flock. Life has no such pure holiday. The air of importance in the youth, born of the sudden sense of his protecting relation and the responsibility which he has undertaken, is curiously mingled with the quite other sense of excessively new clothes, and a bashful feeling that they are flagrantly suggestive of the utter novelty of his position. But this is superficial, and beneath it all is the ineffably serene satisfaction of the newly married man. What is its secret, Leo? I, indeed, can only speculate upon it. But is it not a pardonable vanity, a natural pride, not only that a woman (and such a woman!) has selected him from all mankind, but that the fact is now made manifest to all mankind?

Piccolo approached, and Titania hung upon his arm. There were all the joyful serenity and bashfulness in his mien which I have just mentioned, and there was the newness of attire which would have aroused the suspicion of the dullest observer in the Park. We mutually smiled, and I rose and saluted them with all my heart. Then, when they had gone but a little way, Piccolo slipped his arm from his bride's, and hastening back to me, as if some resistless necessity urged him, he whispered, hurriedly, "You know we were married only on Wednesday," and then hurried away to rejoin Titania. Claudio looked inquiringly, but satisfied, while this little scene passed, and when Piccolo left us, he said, with a smile, "I don't know them, but I suppose I understand all but your remark about Bottom."

I explained it, and I hope not offensively to the doves who had now fluttered out of sight. Piccolo is a youth who, thrown early upon the world, has an immense self-assertion, a dogmatism which is towering. Of course he is unconscious of it, as Bottom did not know that his head was crowned with the lofty ears. His very blandness makes the conceit more ludicrous, as the placidity of Bottom's face made the contrast of the ears more comical. But it is this enormous exaltation of himself which is what little Titania admires. She takes him at his own estimate. He has so impressed her with the conviction that he is a great personage, that the house in which he is a clerk rests upon him as upon a corner-stone, and he is so persuaded of it himself, that it is this fable and distortion which she caresses, and embraces this huge defect as if it were the cardinal beauty of her Piccolo. To fondle faults as charms and graces—is not that to stroke the fair large ears of Bottom?

But how amusing is the serenity of our unconsciousness in wearing that ornament! In Hawthorne's "Marble Faun" do you remember how exquisitely and delicately it is suggested, hinted—or find some airier word to say it—that if the wind should lift the curls of Donatello, the pointed ears of the faun would be revealed, showing the lower nature, the brute not all eliminated from the man? Bottom is Donatello, not with the lower mark wavering shadowy and doubtful in the dark, but towering with complacent triumph above his head; not eluding the suspicion that here may be a defect, but triumphantly declaring that a huge defect is here. Indeed, I am often appalled upon pleasant Sunday mornings to see how many Bottoms come to Saint Rainbow's. I watch them enter at the door, and taking off their hats, they display the most astounding ears. Their Titanias somehow do not seem to be mindful of the exhibition, and they are certainly not troubled by it. We are all so accustomed to it that we observe nothing unusual.

But the worst of it is to perceive suddenly that the ears are even in the pulpit; not at Saint Rainbow's, of course—they are never seen in our pulpit—but in the other churches. I have often sat in a church on a bright June day, "the bridal of the earth and sky," and as I listened to the doctrines that were preached—the narrow, inhuman dogmatism, as it seemed to me, but probably not to others—and reflected upon the joyless, chilly, cruel world which they implied—for I did not like to carry the logic further, to the world's Creator—I have gazed at the earnest speaker who was spinning the unsightly web from his head, surely not from his heart, until I saw distinctly the great ears of Bottom pricking and pointing from his hair; and he, as I say, all unconscious; while the congregation, a rapt Titania, hung upon them with tender solicitude, and, in accepting that strange doctrine for truth and beauty, passionately caressed those formidable ears.

Or there is Anglophob, the statesman, whom you know well. He makes what are called tremendous speeches, in which he thumps the table, and frowns, and lashes himself into a rhetorical frenzy, and shouts that the English nation is the most selfish, mercenary, and mean of all nations; that it has always been the secret foe of liberty, and hates us, whose fathers humiliated her, with an undying hatred. "And I, Sir," roars this great statesman—"I, Sir, for one, wish it to go upon the record of the legislation of my country that I spurn England and despise John Bull; that I will track that hoary liar to his lair, although he may seek to place it beyond the sunset—ay, Sir, beyond the Rocky Mountains; that I defiantly and contemptuously hold open the mouth of the British lion and expectorate into it freely; and that, please God, in the name of my country, I will continue to expectorate in that direction so long as life and the expectorative power are granted me." This is Bottom as the statesman. The thing that distinguishes him is the length of the ears above his head. Blissfully unconscious, he does not suspect that he is an ass; and his public, for he has a public, with the blessed blindness of Titania, hugs those ears as his greatest glory.

How is it, Leo, with you young fellows whose pens are so nimble, and who write endless poems and essays, and publish books every year? I opened one of the new ones the other day, and it seemed to me to aim at what is called sensation, and by the sheerest artifice. Every thing in the book was, to my taste, artificial. But as it is to the taste of the time, the worthy fellow who made the book studies only to gratify that taste, and honestly supposes his facility in doing it to be talent, and probably genius. It is all a huge defect, of which he is totally unconscious, and with which the public is in love. I see the dainty young maidens holding the volume and reading with admiration, and secretly writing perfumed notes to beg an autograph; and once more I see how vast is the wood near Athens, and again I behold the fairy queen Titania caressing the ears of Bottom.

Dear Leo, you know that the "improvement" of a sermon is at the end. I always used to awake when it began, because I knew that "the brunt of the fight" was over. It was the application of the truth of the text to the congregation and to the preacher. And as I come to the end of my letter, I find my hand stealing quietly up to feel for any pointed and hairy protuberance upon my head. Indeed, as I sat with Claudio, my thoughts searched me in the same way. If there be any favor for us, dear boy, let us humbly wonder if it be of a kind that mistakes those terrible ears for essential beauties. Indeed, all favor must put us on our guard. Love is blind, and Titania caresses the ass's ears. Whenever she comes and fondly praises us, while we listen let us meditate the cause, and ascertain if we ought to listen gladly. Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

HOUSE DRESS.

AN important feature in the cut paper pattern of the graceful house dress illustrated on our first page is its plain waist, which includes all the new features in stylish corsages. To have such waists fit perfectly it is necessary that they should display the natural outlines of the figure, and that while they cling too smoothly to wrinkle, they should be ample enough to give the wearer perfect ease. To begin at the foundation, the lining has much to do with the fit of the corsage. The best linings are soft, clinging stuffs that adapt themselves readily to the figure, though too strong to be stretched out of shape. French modistes consider a silk lining indispensable to a handsomely fitted corsage, not of silk dresses only, but of wool and cloth fabrics also. They have long used soft thick gros grain, white, gray, or black, such as is sold for $2 50 a yard, and have introduced this season a still more supple silk with strong serge-like twill. Less-expensive than this is farmer's satin of firm quality, so closely twilled as to be inelastic, worth 85 or 90 cents a yard. Of cotton fabrics the soft twilled English silesia is best. Stiff glazed linen linings, so cold and disagreeable to the wearer, are seldom used. Inexperienced fitters may at the first glance fancy our pattern represents a short basque instead of a plain round waist; but it is the custom now to extend the goods a finger length below the natural waist to cover the hips. This addition is very necessary, as the dress skirt is not sewed to the corsage, as was formerly done, but to a separate belt; and as this belt, worn outside the corsage, is sometimes dragged down slightly by the weight of the skirt, a portion of the white under-garments would be seen between the waist and skirt but for this covering. The two darts on either side of the corsage front are short, and are taken in deeply to permit an ample bust. It is a bad plan to leave bulky dart seams folded inside the lining, merely adding a seam for the whalebone case, as they are apt to draw instead of sitting smoothly. Fastidious modistes have darts opened, pressed, their entire edges bound with thin lutestring ribbon, and a slender whalebone case of bias silk or of ribbon sewed on flatly. It is quite sufficient, however, if they are opened, notched at intervals, and overseamed before the cases are hemmed on. Fronts of corsages are now seldom hemmed, as buttons and button-holes hold them in place. That side of the front in which the holes are worked is merely turned back an inch and a half or two inches, and left loose, to be confined by the button-holes; while that side holding the buttons is not turned back at all, but extends its full breadth an inch or more beyond the buttons, to serve as a sort of facing beneath the button-holes, and prevent the white under-clothing from showing through. A line of substantial tape is placed under the buttons to strengthen them. From seven to ten buttons are down the front of the corsage, and these invariably have button-holes, instead of being placed outside for ornament merely. The two rows of stitching formerly used—one inside, the other outside, of the arm—are no longer used: indeed, it will be seen that all outside stitching on corsages is dispensed with. The seam under the arm is straight and in a line with the natural figure, not quite so far behind as some modistes place it, evidently intending to make the back look narrow. The fancy now is for plump, round, healthy waists, instead of slender, delicate ones. Almost all French dresses have a seam down the middle of the back. This plan is widely adopted here, and is especially becoming to over-stout figures, and for such we commend also the two side bodies used with the Worth basque. The pattern given this week may have the middle seam or not, as the wearer chooses. Side forms are broad, coming into the armhole half-way between the shoulder seam and the seam under the arm; they should curve high in the back instead of sloping off obliquely to the belt; at the smallest part of the waist they leave an inch and a half of space in the middle piece of the back, or two inches if there is a seam down the middle. These side forms are sewed inside, without the outside stitching once thought necessary for them. Shoulder seams are placed high—that is, in a line with the shoulders, not behind them—and are very short, the armhole coming above the arm joint instead of below it. A finger-length and a half is now quite a long shoulder seam for women of average size. These short seams give the appearance of sloping shoulders without making the figure look contracted. The best modistes no longer cord the armholes, unless the corsage is of very thin fabric that needs to be strengthened. The corsage is made very high in the neck, and finished by a narrow bias binding, or else merely corded. The last thing done is to put a ribbon belt under the corsage at its narrowest taper to hold the waist in place. This belt is tacked to the back and side seams, leaving the fronts loose to fasten by hooks and eyes.

Ample directions are given elsewhere for making the belt and sash ends, the sleeves, and skirts of this dress. The belts to which the skirts are attached should be of the dress material lined substantially. The Watteau fold on the over-skirt is made double, that it may not require a facing when made of material having a right and wrong side. The deep kilt or side pleating illustrated is at this moment the favorite trimming for lower skirts, and is seen occasionally much deeper than we represent it in the illustration. The bias band or fold, and the netted fringe two and a half inches wide, make a most stylish heading. Fine poplin de laine, serge, merino, empress cloth, satines, and alpaca are made up after this design, and it is also used for plain silks. Many ladies, weary of basques, are returning to these plain corsages that are so easily made at home. It may interest some readers to know that fashionable modistes here charge from $50 to $75 for making such a dress, which a lady can easily make herself with the aid of the cut paper pattern. Although designed for the house, this costume is made appropriate for the street by adding a double cape, mantle, or sacque of the dress material, or of black cashmere or cloth; a gay striped Ottoman shawl, or a cashmere or fur cloak, is also worn with it—indeed any over garment but a close-fitting polonaise. To wear the latter, the upper skirt must be left off.

CHILDREN'S CLOTHING.

There is no change in the style of children's and misses' dresses. White piqué and muslin dresses are still worn all winter by small girls, and they retain the simple Gabrielle and princesse shapes found among our cut paper patterns. The trimmings are elaborate braiding of fanciful braids, two or three different widths and kinds of braid being used in one dress; medallions of muslin embroidery are inserted in braided leaves and pyramids, and the edge of the dress is scalloped and finished with a feathery lace braid designed for this purpose.

Dress skirts are short, extending just below the knee. Wide ribbon sashes, tied behind, with huge loops and short ends, are used, while many mothers prefer the simple flowing dress unconfined at the waist.

The walking coat, warmly wadded, and with ample cape, does not differ from those worn last spring, except in the material. Cashmere and Irish poplin are the fabrics for those for dressy occasions, and pressed flannel in broken plaids for ordinary wear. Soutache braiding of the color of the cloak, or else quilted silk, is the trimming. They cost at the furnishing stores from $15 to $25. Sacques of white rabbit-skin are also much worn by these wee toddlers. They are soft and warm, and cost from $10 to $14.

Short jaunty basques with two skirts are worn by larger girls. School dresses have plain waists fastened behind, or else blouses with box-pleats. A black alpaca skirt with some sort of over dress, either a polonaise or blouse and upper skirt of dark blue or crimson merino, is a useful costume for every-day wear. Blue cloth sacques with white cord piping, black silk bands, and gilt buttons are much worn by young girls. Turbans, and the jaunty Tyrolese felt hat with a gay feather, are their chapeaux.

Girls of ten or twelve years wear their dress skirts to the top of Polish boots. Polonaises are in favor with misses just in their teens. They are usually of the dress material. Solid colors are preferred this year to the bright plaids of last season. Cloth sacques, made in Berlin, are imported for girls of from six to twelve years. They are of plum, blue, green, or brown cloth, with velvet bands and simple braiding, and cost from $14 to $21.

Highland suits with amply pleated kilt are still in favor for boys not yet in trowsers. Dark plaids, usually blocks of brown, gray, or blue with black, are chosen for the skirts, while the jacket is of cloth of the color prevailing in the plaid, or else of black velveteen. Imported Highland suits, with all the appointments complete, cost as high as $75.

Vests are the important item in suits for small boys. They are made like those formerly illustrated in the Bazar, and worn with a jacket having a low rolling collar. The knee pantaloons have braid and buttons up the outer seam. Dark blue cloth is chosen for best suits, cassimeres with almost invisible stripes for school suits.

Overcoats are sacks with a large round cape.

PERSONAL.

FOR a self-possessed wag we have confidence in OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. An autograph collector, knowing O. W. H.'s antipathy to creatures of his class, and wishing to capture a specimen of the metaphysician's chirography, adopted the heartless subterfuge of asking by letter, "Which do you think the best dictionary—WEBSTER'S or WORCESTER'S?" a question which he believed HOLMES'S courtesy would compel him to answer. The return mail brought a single sheet of note-paper, on which was neatly pasted the one word, clipped from the writer's own letter, "WEBSTER'S."

—When that dreadful ROSENZWEIG reached the State-prison at Sing Sing, they instantly put him at work breaking stones. He objected on the ground that his neat white hands were not adapted to the business. But they keep him at it.

—Mlle. WALEWSKA was recently married in Paris, and the "nuptial benediction" was given by the papal nuncio. The bride is singularly beautiful. Comte de BOURGUENY, the bridegroom, has been appointed to a diplomatic post at Washington, whither he takes his wife.

—It was a fine bit of revenge in Sir TALLEMACHE SINCLAIR, a Scotch member of Parliament, to have delivered at the last session the same speech twice, on the express ground that the House had not given him its attention the first time.

—M. CHARLES LEFEVRE, a horse-racy Frenchman, who runs his animals in England, has just come into $2,500,000 left him by a cousin whom he never saw. The gentleman in question died in this country, whither he emigrated many years since with the sum of $2500, which M. LEFEVRE'S father lent him when all his other relatives turned their backs upon him.

—CHARLES MATHEWS, who is now sixty-eight, and admirably preserved, was asked a few days since by a gentleman how he managed to keep so much health and spirits. "Well," said the comedian, "I've lived a pretty free life, but I always made it a rule to have eight hours sleep out of the twenty-four. And then I always eat four good, sound meals a day." "But are you not a great smoker?" "Well, no, not so very much of a smoker. I begin every morning, it is true, but then I leave off at night."

—The Rev. Mr. VOYSEY, an English clergyman, is malignantly alluded to by a carping newspaper man as a person who has devised a church ritual of his own, which is not orthodox, but VOYSEY-versy. In his new Litany he has inserted this much-needed supplication, "That it may please Thee to help all literary persons, and the editors of the public press."

—The Queen of the Belgians, having different views from those entertained by her dress-maker as to the money value of apparel, has been sued by the latter for $15,400. The Queen reluctantly at the bill, pronouncing it exorbitant, and thinking it a swindle.

—JOHN KEMBLE used to say that he could learn a whole number of the Morning Post in four days. ROBERT DILLON could repeat in the morning six columns of a newspaper he had read overnight. SCALIGER could repeat a hundred verses or more after having read them a single time. SENECA could repeat two thousand words after having heard them once. A physician of Massachusetts, about half a century ago, could repeat the whole of "Paradise Lost" without mistake, although he had not read it for twenty years. JOHN FULLER, a land agent at Norfolk, England, could remember every word of a sermon, and write it out correctly after going home.

—Mr. WILLIAM H. WEBB, of this city, is among the governments of Europe to induce them to take part in the scientific investigation of a ship-canal through the Isthmus of Panama, and guaranteeing its neutrality.

—The Mrs. SARAH A. COOK who has sued BRIGHAM YOUNG for $10,000, which was deposited with him for her benefit many years ago, at the time when her husband met a violent death, was formerly from Davenport, Iowa, and taught music. Her husband was an accountant. She was an accomplished and attractive woman. In 1851, while on the way to California, they stopped at Salt Lake, and becoming Mormons in theory—never in practice—concluded to dwell at Salt Lake. In due time Mr. COOK became sheriff, and was killed while attempting to arrest a noted criminal in the streets of Salt Lake City. There was great excitement over his violent death; the murderer was hung by a mob, and the citizens raised $10,000 in gold for the benefit of the widow and her family. The sum was placed in the hands of BRIGHAM YOUNG for investment. The old bigamist gave out that it was invested in certain real estate in Salt Lake City; but a few years after, when Mrs. COOK endeavored to sell some of the lots which were pointed out as a part of the investment, she discovered that the title was not in her name, nor in BRIGHAM'S, but it was all in the Mormon Church. She was told that the least she said about it the better for her. She could do nothing. She was a lone woman, and the thieves were all powerful. Now the tables are turned. The government has laid its hands on those who wronged her, and demands with her the payment of that nice sum of $10,000 out of which she was defrauded. Mrs. COOK renounced Mormonism some time since.

—The Rev. Mr. BENSON, an English clergyman recently returned to that country from a visit to the United States, speaking of American audiences, says: "It is astonishing how hearty and intelligent an attention the American people give to what one says. They really think it over, and then go and act upon it. I won't speak about congregations near Oxford, but in some parts of the country English congregations are very different. I always found American congregations treated what one said as something of importance, and were anxious to hear more, and have matters explained, as if the teachings of Divine truth were really a business for preacher and listener, like any other business." Mr. BENSON adds: "I was much pleased in passing through New York to form, I may say, the friendship of a delightful man, Bishop POTTER. He is singularly adapted for his position, refined and elegant in his demeanor, and large-hearted and warm-hearted in all his dealings. Of course he is pulled about in all directions by people of all sorts; but he shows one in his truly apostolical deportment that he is simply seeking to carry on the work of God, and lead all to His love."

—The homestead of THADDEUS STEVENS, "the great commoner," was advertised to be sold at Lancaster on Tuesday, the 7th ult. It is a two-story brick dwelling-house, 38½ by 55 feet, and in good condition. The adjacent office is said to be "complete in all that pertains to a professional man's business place."

—Rev. ROBERT COLLYER preached in St. Louis the other evening. He lost his home and church in the fire at Chicago. He remarked that "amidst the desolation and horror there was something more beautiful and noble than any thing he had seen in the world before, for the splendid American character then came out in a beauty such as he had never witnessed in his life. He did not hear a man moan; he did not see a woman weep." He added that he had cried, but it was because he was an Englishman. Mr. COLLYER has come up to the emergency in the pluckiest manner.

—The Rev. Dr. SEELYE, of Easthampton, was recently told by the livery-stable man that if he didn't resume the afternoon service he must buy more horses.

—HENRY WARD BEECHER says that "mankind has two nurses, Pleasure and Pain; two school-masters, Joy and Grief; two guides and interpreters, Sorrow and Gladness."

—FANNY ELSLER, who once cut so many capers, and took away so much money from the United States, is now living quietly at the Hague, occupying most of her time in raising flowers, of which she is passionately fond. Roses are her favorites, and she has raised one particular kind, which has for some time borne her name, and which is much prized in Holland. Though she danced before our grandmothers, she has entered only very recently on her sixty-first year. She is much esteemed in the Dutch capital for her numerous deeds of charity. It is said that RALPH WALDO EMERSON and MARGARET FULLER once went, in Boston, to see her dance. They were in raptures at her "poetry of motion." Turning to Mr. EMERSON, Miss FULLER exclaimed, "RALPH, it's divine!" The philosopher replied, "MARGARET, it's religion!"

—Mr. J. W. SCHUCKERS, the private secretary of Chief Justice CHASE, is preparing a statement of the financial history of the government from the beginning.

—As a specimen of the sort of "personal" that appears in one of the local journals of India, may be quoted the following: "We are very glad to learn that the marriage of Mr. Rughoonathdas Madhowdas, a Kupola Bunia merchant of Bombay, with Dhuncoorbal, the daughter of Shet Gudhurdas Mohundas, and the widow of Luchmichand Dhurumsey, was celebrated at Chinchpoogly."

—Ex-Governor WISE, of Virginia, has nearly ready for the press a book to be called "Seven Decades of the Union," including a narrative of the life of JOHN TYLER.

—When HAWTHORNE was removed from his pleasant little place in the Custom-house at Salem his wife lighted a fire in the study, and remarked to him that she was rather pleased at the manœuvre; he would now find time to finish his romance, as she had saved enough from his salary to keep them in bread for a few weeks. He went to work, and the "Scarlet Letter" soon enabled them to live in comparative ease.

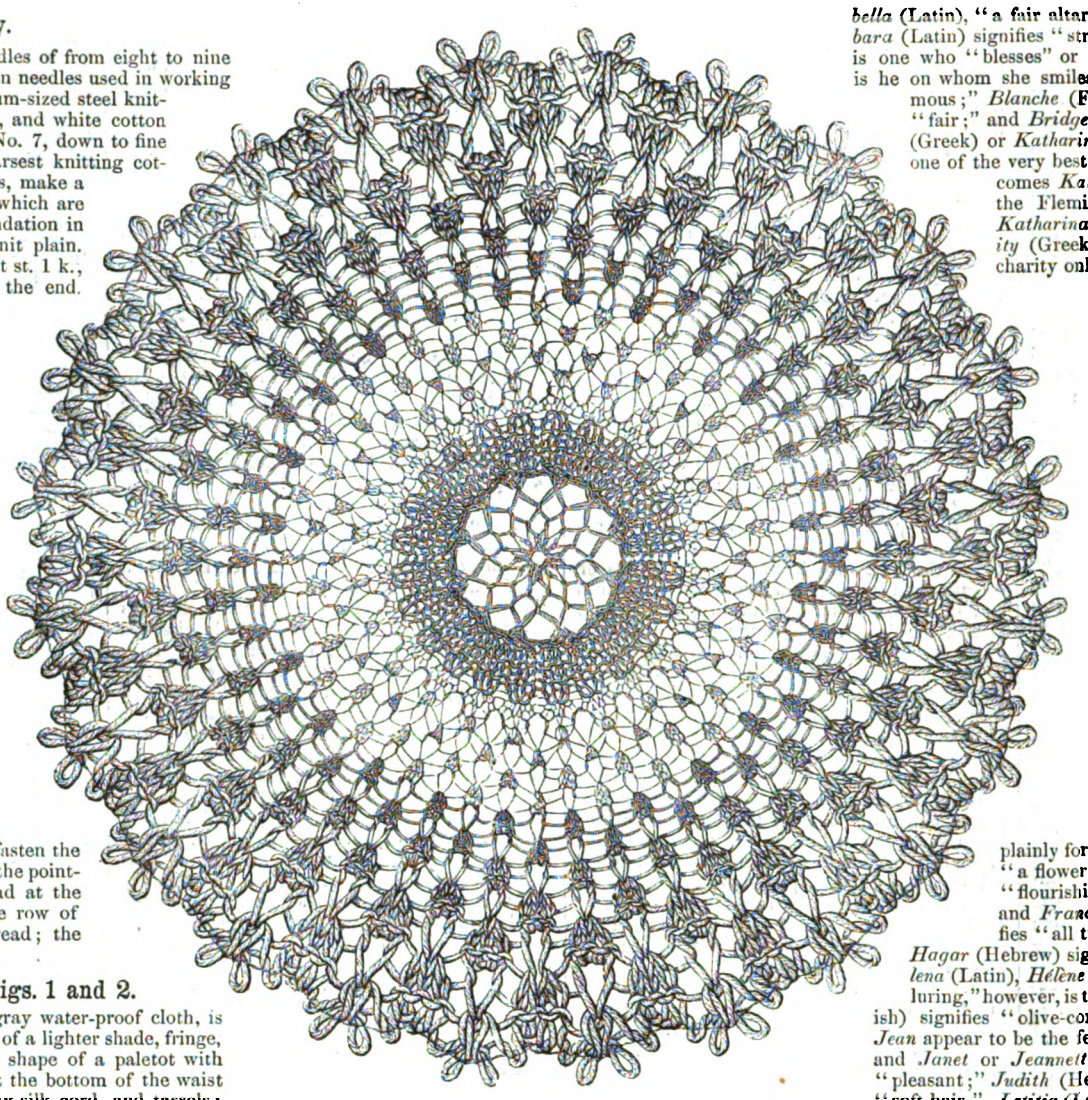
Knitted Tidy.

FOR this pretty tidy use knitting-needles of from eight to nine different sizes—from the coarsest wooden needles used in working with tapestry worsted down to the medium-sized steel knitting-needles—four needles of each size, and white cotton from the size of fivefold Estremadura, No. 7, down to fine sewing cotton, No. 150. With the coarsest knitting cotton, and on the coarsest wooden needles, make a simple foundation of 96 st. (stitches), which are placed on three needles; close this foundation in a ring, and knit the 1st round.—All knit plain. 2d round.—3 k. (knit plain), on the next st. 1 k., 1 p. (purled), 1 k., repeat from * to the end. 3d round.—* 2 st. slipped off together (as if going to knit them plain), 1 k., draw the slipped st. over, 3 p., repeat from * to the end. These two rounds are repeated, regularly grading the size of the cotton and the needles until eleven rows of dots are knitted. Knit four rounds each with the last two or three grades of cotton and needles. After the last row of dots work two rounds more, all knit plain, with the finest cotton. In the following round purl the 3 st. over each dot of the preceding round together with Estremadura, No. 7, and knit the next st. plain. Then work with the same cotton five rounds of 1 k., 1 p. reversed in position, in doing which the third and fourth st. are always worked off together in the last round; then two more rounds purled. The star at the centre is formed by working several rounds of button-hole stitches with the same cotton. In the first of these rounds always work off 3 st. together of the last knitted round. Draw the button-hole stitches together in a small ring at the middle, fasten the thread, and cut it off. In order to form the pointed outer edge, rip the foundation thread at the beginning of the work, and through the row of stitches thus formed draw very fine thread; the stitches are thus prevented from ripping.



KNITTED TIDY.

Water-proof Over Dress, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS over dress, which is made of gray water-proof cloth, is trimmed with strips of the same material of a lighter shade, fringe, silk cord, and tassels. It is cut in the shape of a paletot with long fronts, and is draped in the back at the bottom of the waist with a passementerie agrafe, coarse gray silk cord, and tassels; the back and fronts are trimmed with a braiding of silk cord. The long back of the over dress, which is arranged in a wide pleat, is cut separately, sewed on a belt, and set under the back.

CHRISTIAN NAMES.

ALL names were originally significant, and were bestowed with reference to their well-understood meaning. They were intended to convey the idea of some physical, or mental, or moral distinction on the part of the individuals bearing them. Our great progenitor was called Adam, because he was made of the earth, earthy—red, or red earth, being the meaning of the name. Adam called his wife Eve, the word signifying life, or life-giving, because she was to be mother of all living. At the very beginning, then, it is plain people were called by significant names, and the practice was preserved for many ages. Nowadays we call a boy George or John, because it is his father's name, and was his father's name before him; we ignorantly or carelessly misapply our names, and label our children with absurd misnomers. Call a boy Alphonso, and he may grow up a weak-minded, dawdlish, ursine-visaged creature of the Dundrearyish type; what an absurdity is that name for him! It signifies our help, and there is something extremely ridiculous in the connection.

Abigail (Hebrew) signifies "thy father's joy;" Abishag (Hebrew), "the father's error"—a wide difference, of considerable importance if names be significant of character. Ada (Saxon) signifies "happy," and Adelaide (German) means a "princess;" Agatha (Greek) means "good"—in the very highest and best sense of the word. To be worthy of this name, indicative as it is of all the virtues, is an object which may well enlist the noblest ambition of maid or wife. Agnes (Greek) signifies "chaste," and is one of the best names in use. Alethea and Althea (both Greek) signify, the first "the truth;" the second "hunting." Alice and Alicia (German) signify "noble." Amelia or Amélie (French) signifies "beloved." Amy or Amie, and Emily, have the same derivation and meaning. Our catalogue of names contains few sweeter and no more lovable names. Happy is she who bears a name indicative of so much happiness. Happy he who can whisper in her ear, Aimée, beloved! Anna, Anne, or Hannah (Hebrew), signifies "gracious;" Arabella (Latin), "a fair altar;" Aureola (Latin), "like gold." Barbara (Latin) signifies "strange" or "foreign." Beatrice (Latin) is one who "blesses" or "makes happy." Blessed (Benedict) is he on whom she smiles. Bertha (Greek), "bright" or "famous;" Blanche (French) and Bianca (Italian), "white," "fair;" and Bridget (Irish), "shining bright." Catherine (Greek) or Katharine signifies "pure" or "chaste," and is one of the very best of our female names. In Irish it becomes Kathleen (mavourneen, of course), and in the Flemish Kateline. A pretty diminutive is Katharina; but best and plainest is Kate. Charity (Greek) expresses its own meaning, not the charity only that gives to the poor, but that takes its place with the sister graces, Hope and Faith. Charlotte (French), "all noble;" the same meaning attaches to Caroline, the feminine of Charles, "noble-spirited;" then Chloe (Greek), a "herb;" and Cecilia and Cicely, corruption of Cecil (Latin), which signifies "short" or "dim sighted"—not a name to be chosen by those who would keep their eyes open, and widely different from Clara (Latin), "clear" or "bright." Constance is an excellent name (Latin), and given in the idea of one who would "constant be" in fair or foul fortune. Deborah (Hebrew) signifies "a bee"—a significant name for a woman. Drusilla (Greek) means "dewy eyes;" and Dulcibelle (Latin), "sweet and fair." Edith (Saxon) signifies "happiness;" Eleanor (Saxon) and Eléonore (French) mean "all fruitful." Elizabeth and Eliza (Hebrew) signify "the oath of God;" Emma (German), "a nurse;" Esther (Hebrew), "star of the morning;" Eunice (Greek), "fair victory;" Euodice (Greek), "prosperity in the way." Then comes Faith, which speaks plainly for itself; and Flora (Latin), which means "a flower;" and Florence (Latin), which signifies "flourishing;" and Fortune (plain English again); and Frances, "free." Gertrude (German) signifies "all truth;" Grace (Latin) signifies "favor;" Hagar (Hebrew) signifies "a stranger;" Helen (Greek), Helena (Latin), Hélène (French), is of doubtful meaning—"alluring," however, is the common acceptation. Isabella (Spanish) signifies "olive-complexioned," or "brown." Jane and Jean appear to be the feminine of John, signifying "gracious," and Janet or Jeannette is "little Jane;" Joyce (French) is "pleasant;" Judith (Hebrew), "praising;" and Julia (Latin), "soft hair." Letitia (Latin) signifies "gladness;" Lucy (Latin), "bright;" Mabel (Latin), "lovely;" Margaret (Greek), "a pearl;" Martha (Hebrew), "bitterness," and Mary, "bitter," from the Hebrew Maria; Matilda (Greek) signifies "noble" or "stately;" Miranda (Latin), "admired;" Mildred (Saxon), "mild-spoken;" Patience, which speaks for itself; Phabe (Greek), "the light of life;" Phyllis (Greek), "a green bough;" Priscilla (Latin), "somewhat old;" Prudence, another patent name; Rachel (Hebrew), "a lamb;" Rhoda (Greek), "a rose;" Ruth (Hebrew), "trembler," is a pretty name, suggestive of a meek and quiet spirit; Salome (Hebrew), "perfect;" Sarah (Hebrew), "a princess;" Sophia (Greek), "wisdom;" Susannah (Hebrew), "a lily;" Tabitha (Syriac), "a roe;" Victoria (Latin), "victorious;" Winifred (Saxon), "winning place."

OLD RUDDERFORD HALL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

OLD RUDDERFORD HALL lay back from the high-road, buried in trees, and all the traveler saw of it was a glimpse of mellow red brick chimney, or an angle of the steep tiled roof, above oaks and elms that had been growing ever since the Norman conquest, when all about the trim little out-of-the-world village of Rudderford was forest land.

New Rudderford Hall fronted the turnpike-road, resplendent with three rows of shining plate glass windows, a brilliant stuccoed front, a conservatory with a glass dome flashing in the summer sun, a prim lawn embellished with geometrical flower beds, all ablaze with scarlet and yellow, and two pair of brand-new Birmingham iron gates, of florid design, surmounted by two pair of lamps. New Rudderford Hall looked what it was—the abode of commercial wealth. New Rudderford Hall gave dinner-parties, a ball once a year, hunting breakfasts in the late autumn, private theatricals at Christmas. New Rudderford Hall had three rosy daughters and one stalwart, hard-riding son, the apple of its eye.

Old Rudderford Hall rarely opened its rusty gates or unlocked its creaking doors. There was, indeed, a legend that no stranger had broken bread there for a century; yet there was a counter-story current to the effect that the master of Old Rudderford Hall could, when he chose, open a bottle of rare old wine for a visitor—Madeira that had voyaged three times to and fro the East Indies, sirupy Malmsey, golden-tinted Tokay, oily Constantia with a faint bitter twang. Old Rudderford Hall had one only child, a daughter, fair to see, who rode an ancient purblind palfrey about the shady lanes round Rudderford, and was met sometimes in the dwellings of the poor, but never in that exalted sphere which Rudderford called "society." Old Rudderford Hall rejoiced in that patrician appendage—a family ghost.

The story went that a Champion of the days of the Stuarts had slain his wife in some fit of jealous fury, and that the poor lady's restless spirit—the legend hinted at her guilt—haunted the long dark passages and dismal chambers of the old house. It was not very clear that any one had ever seen her, but she was firmly believed in, nevertheless, and plenty of people were able to give a graphic description of her—a tall, graceful lady, dressed in white, with flowing auburn hair falling over her neck and shoulders.

The present owner of the Hall was Anthony Champion, and the estate had belonged to the house of Champion ever since the days of Henry VIII., who, in the distribution of church property, had rewarded his liege servant, Thomas Champion, gentleman, for divers services not set down in the title-deeds of the estate, with the copyhold of Rudderford Chase and Rudderford Grange, previously held by a monkish fraternity settled in the neighborhood.

There were portions of the old Grange still standing—massive stone walls pierced with narrow arched windows, a winding staircase, and low oak door, iron-bound and studded with huge nails; but these stone buildings now served only as offices, and the Hall proper had been built by the aforesaid Thomas Champion, with much splendor and lavish expenditure, in an age when architectural extravagance had been made fashionable by the magnificent Wolsey. The house was one of the finest specimens of domestic architecture in England, but had been sorely neglected for the last century. Wherever decay could arise it had arisen, and a settled gloom had fallen upon the mansion and its surroundings. Only in the flower garden was there any glimpse of neatness or brightness, and that was due to the care of Christabel Champion, who loved the old flower beds, the grassy walks, and ancient roses, and who not only superintended the labors of a great hulking lad of seventeen, sole gardener at the Hall, but worked hard herself into the bargain.

Within, the gloom was almost oppressive. Anthony Champion was a man who lived among his books, and dreamed away his days over mouldy old folios and rare editions collected by his father, when the Champion purse was deeper than it was nowadays. He lived almost wholly in his library, only emerging at seven in the evening to share his daughter's frugal dinner, and to doze or muse for an hour or so afterward in the long saloon. There was some little show of state and ceremony kept up at the Hall, though there were only three servants in a house where there had once been forty—an ancient butler and housekeeper, man and wife, and a buxom country girl, who did all the scrubbing and cleaning, attended to a small dairy, and waited upon Christabel.

The master of Old Rudderford Hall was as poor as Job in his day of affliction; or at least so ran the common rumor, amply sustained by the mode and manner of his existence. A hundred years ago there had been revelry and splendor at the grand old house, but at that time a great misfortune befell its master in the untimely death of his eldest son, killed in a duel: and the bereaved father shut up the house, and went to France, where he lived a wild life, and squandered a noble fortune at the profligate court of Louis the Well-beloved. He died in Paris a year or so before the revolution, which was to regenerate mankind, arrived at that stage in which it began to improve them off the face of the earth, and probably by his timely decease escaped a ruder exit via the guillotine. His estate, much impoverished, descended to a nephew, a studious young man, lame and of feeble health, who married a girl of humble birth, lived the life of a recluse in the neglected house, and became the father of Anthony Champion, the present master of the old Hall.

It is possible that when young Anthony inherited the estate, shrunk and burdened as it was, he might have made some effort to brighten and improve things, if fortune had favored him ever so little. But again did affliction fall heavily upon the old house. He married a woman he adored, a fair young girl of high family but no fortune, and brought her home to the Hall, full of all manner of schemes for the future. For a little more than a year he lived a life of supreme domestic happiness, and then—two months after the birth of a baby girl—he saw an unusual flush upon his young wife's cheek one day, and the next beheld her stricken with typhus fever. In a week all was over, and he stood alone by his dreary hearth, like a strong man turned to stone. It was long before the caresses of his child could bring the faintest shadow of a smile to his haggard face. He seemed to grow an old man all at once. Unlike his ancestor, he did not turn his back upon the scene of his suffering; he only entombed himself there, buried alive among his books. He had inherited his father's studious habits; and after a weary year, in which he sat alone day after day, helpless, hopeless, blankly staring at the wall before him, and brooding over his misery, he grew to find some cold comfort in recondite studies of so close and severe a kind that the more credulous among his neighbors talked of him darkly as of something not quite canny.

For such a man society could have no charm. Had he possessed the wealth of all the Rothschilds, he would have lived very much as he did live. A retinue of servants might have eaten and drunk at his expense, a vast amount of splendid upholstery might have been created at his cost; but his individual expenditure would have been no greater, his manner of existence no more cheerful. He lived alone by choice; and so utterly narrowed had his mind become by constant brooding on one vain regret, as to make him half unconscious that this hermit life was scarcely the best and brightest for a girl of eighteen. The motherless baby whose plaintive cries had rent his heart years ago had blossomed into a lovely girl, painfully like his lost wife. Long and dreary as his days and nights had seemed to him ever since that loss, he had been scarcely conscious of the actual progress of time. The lapse might be five years or fifty. It was a surprise to him to see his daughter grown to womanhood. He woke up from a long sleep, as it were, and looked at her with vague wonder. Seven or eight years before he had made a friendly arrangement with the rector's wife, by which Christabel was to share the studies of the four girls at the rectory, under an admirable governess; and by virtue of this arrangement his daughter's education had cost him very little money and no trouble.

He loved her fondly, and yet had given her little of his confidence. Rarely did he see the fair young face looking up at him without a faint pang, which was like the memory of an acute agony rather than actual present pain. She was so like her mother! He fancied sometimes how fair a picture those two faces would have made side by side—one developed and matronly, the other in all the bloom of girlhood.

She had her little circle of friends—a very small one. The only house she visited was the rectory, and there she came and went like a daughter of the house. There she had met the New Rudderford Hall people—Frank Greenwood and his three sisters, who fell in love with her—the sisters, that is to say—at first sight. Frank said very little about her. She declined all invitations for parties, however—indeed she had none of the finery required for such occasions—but consented to join them now and then on the croquet lawn and share their afternoon tea.

THE SOMNAMBULIST.

CHAPTER II.

NEW RUDDERFORD HALL was built upon a part of the land which King Henry bestowed upon his liege Thomas Champion, and this fact was resented by Anthony as a personal offense against him upon the part of Mr. Greenwood. If he had been a visiting man even, nothing could have induced him to break bread with the master of the new Hall, and he always heard of his daughter's intimacy with "those Greenwood girls" with displeasure.

"I can't imagine what induces you to cultivate such people, Christabel," he said, fretfully, as they were sitting together in the summer dusk after dinner one evening in the long saloon—a melancholy room which would have accommodated an assembly of fifty, and seemed very dreary, in its faded splendor, occupied only by the father and daughter.

"I never have cultivated them, papa. You know how many invitations they have sent me, and I have declined them all."

"You have been to their house."

"Yes, to play croquet now and then; never to any of their parties."

"I suppose that is a deprivation," said Mr. Champion, with a sigh. "I dare say there are people who would call me a cruel father, and the life you lead in this old house an unnatural one."

"Pray, pray don't say that, my dear father," cried the girl, earnestly, coming over to his chair by the open window, and laying her hand caressingly upon his shoulder. "You know that I am quite content to be with you; there is no higher happiness I could desire than that. If our lives are a little dull sometimes, and one is subject to an occasional attack of low spirits, never mind: there are other times when life seems all sunshine, and the garden and the dear old house enchanted, like the fairy palace in 'Beauty and the Beast.' Why, after all, my life is quite as gay as Beauty's was. As long as you like to live alone, papa, I will be content with our solitude; though I confess it would make me happy to see you go more into the world."

The world, in Christabel's ideas, meant Rudderford and half a dozen houses within half a dozen miles of Rudderford. Perhaps the world of which she was thinking just at this moment meant even something less than that—an occasional dinner-party at Samuel Greenwood's smart stuccoed mansion.

"That is a sight you will never see, my dear," answered her father, drearily. "I shut my door upon the world when I came home from your mother's funeral—home! and she was no longer there! No, Christabel; the world and I have parted company too long for any sympathy to be possible between us. A man coming out into the clamor and confusion of Paris after five-and-twenty years in one of the under-ground cells of the Bastile could not feel himself more a stranger than I should if I were to go into the world now. But I am not going to keep you buried alive forever. You have blossomed into a woman all at once, and taken me by surprise. I want a little time to think about it, and then I shall form some plan for giving you a brighter life."

"I don't wish for any change, papa; I would not leave you. If you have any plan for sending me away, pray abandon it. Not all the pleasures in the world would make up to me for leaving you. Indeed, indeed, I am quite happy! I have my poor people to visit, and—and—a few friends"—she hesitated, with a sudden blush, remembering that those obnoxious Greenwoods were among the few—"and my dear old horse, Gilpin."

Mr. Champion smiled at the mention of this last item.

"Gilpin is scarcely a steed for a young lady to boast of," said he. "I suppose the world thinks that I can give you no better mount than old Gilpin; that I live the life I do from poverty as much as for any other reason."

"People may think so, papa; what does it matter?"

"Nothing, child; but for once the world is out in its reckoning. I am not a poor man. The estate was heavily burdened when I succeeded to it, but money has accumulated rapidly in the life I have led, and I have paid off every thing—have saved money too. If I could have only bought back the land upon which the new Hall stands, and pulled down that vulgar cockney house, I should think my money worth something; but that's out of the question. Samuel Greenwood is one of the richest men in the county, and would dearly like to buy me out of this place. However, don't let's talk of him: the subject always puts me out of temper. When the time comes for your marrying, Christabel, you will not be a penniless bride."

"I hope, if ever I do marry, papa, it will be some one who won't care whether I have any money or not."

"Of course; that's a girl's notion. But people do care. I don't want you to marry a pauper, who, having nothing to bestow, would be content to take you with nothing. The age has grown commercial, my dear; the more money a man has, the more he expects with his wife. And when you go into society by-and-by, as I intend you shall do, you shall appear as becomes a gentleman's daughter; and when you marry, you shall have such jewels as not one woman in a hundred can show."

"Jewels, papa!" cried Christabel, opening her blue eyes to their widest extent—"jewels!"

Except a white carnelian necklace, and a gold heart-shaped locket containing her mother's hair, the girl had never possessed a trinket in her life.

"Yes, child, jewels. Stay here a minute, and I'll show you something."

There was a door at one end of the saloon opening into the library, that darksome den in which Anthony Champion spent his days, and which was rarely invaded by the foot of the industrious house-maid. A dingy old room, lined from floor to ceiling with dingy books—books in piles on the floor, books on the mantel-piece, books heaped up on the three broad oak window-seats, books every where—and between the windows two huge carved oak muniment chests.

Anthony left his daughter in the saloon and went into the library. He unlocked one of these muniment chests, and took out a battered old leather-covered box, which had once been crimson. This he brought to Christabel. There was just light enough for her to see some faded gilt lettering at the top, the initials "C. C."

"Was that my mother's?" she asked, scrutinizing those two letters with interest.

"No. This jewel-case belonged to your great-aunt, Caroline Champion, the mother of that unhappy lad who lost his life in a drunken brawl which ended in bloodshed. When Angus Champion turned his back upon Rudderford, he left this box behind him—forgot its existence, perhaps; who knows? His wife had been dead nine years. At any rate, although he spent almost every thing he could lay his hands on, the jewels remained in an iron safe in the steward's room, among old leases and useless parchments, and there my father found them when he inherited the property. As they had escaped so long, he did not care to sell them. 'My son's wife shall wear them,' he said. But your mother never lived to wear them, Christabel. We used to talk merrily enough of the day when she should be presented at court in a blaze of diamonds. Yet she wore no ornaments but the roses we put in her coffin." He stopped for a few moments: that memory never came to him without the familiar pang. "And now I am going to dazzle your eyes," he said, putting aside the bitter thought with an effort. There are loves that do verily last a lifetime, and his was one of those.

He unlocked the jewel-case, and lifted the lid. Christabel gave a great cry of rapture. There was a tray of diamonds—necklace, bracelets, brooch, ear-rings, set in silver, in a solid, simple style. The stones were large and brilliant, perfect in color, of a greater value than Anthony Champion imagined, though he deemed them worth a round sum.

He raised the upper tray, and revealed a lower one, full of sapphires in a quaint filigree gold setting; then he showed his daughter another tray containing a necklace and ear-rings of amethyst and pearls, which Christabel declared were more beautiful than the diamonds; and then the bottom of the box, in which there were only odds and ends—antique rings, an apostle-spoon, a smelling-bottle, a couple of thimbles, a fruit-knife, a locket, a brooch or two, and so on. But these interested Christabel almost more than the precious stones, and she sat looking them over, entranced, with the three jewel-trays spread out upon the table.

"Hark!" said her father, suddenly. "What was that?"

"What, papa?"

"That noise outside; it sounded like a step upon the gravel. Look out, Christabel, and see if there is any one."

Miss Champion stepped out of the long window. There was a wide gravel-walk before the saloon windows, somewhat weedy and moss-grown, and beyond that a shrubbery, where the young firs and shrubs grew thick and tall—a shrubbery in which a dozen men might have hidden securely enough.

There was no one to be seen. The girl glanced up and down the weedy walk, very desolate-looking in the summer twilight, and peered into the shrubbery, parting the thick laurels here and there, but without result.

"Are you sure you heard a footstep, papa?" she asked, rather incredulously, as she came back to the room.

"Yes," said Mr. Champion—who had been hastily replacing the jewel-trays while his daughter was looking about—"I am sure. And there was something more than a footstep: I saw a shadow fall across the window."

"The shadow of a tree, perhaps, papa."

"There is no tree that can cast a shadow on this window. It was gone in a moment. There has been some one watching us, Christabel."

"A tramp, perhaps, papa," said Miss Champion, coolly.

The approaches to Old Rudderford Hall were ill guarded—guarded not at all, in fact. The gates were never locked, and for those intruders who might find the legitimate mode of entrance inconvenient there were numerous gaps in the fence through which they might roam into the park at will.

Plenty of tramps, therefore, came to the old Hall, and were wont to depart protesting against the inhospitality of the back-door and kitchen department in general. There were no beer-drinking grooms to wheedle out of a friendly pint; no gossiping scullery-maids to give them bread and cheese or broken victuals—the bone of a leg of mutton and half a loaf of bread, or the carcasses of a pair of fowls and a dish of cold vegetables. There was nothing to be heard or seen; no hen-roosts to be robbed, for the poultry-yard was a desert: only closely shut doors and blank iron-barred windows; weeds growing between the flag-stones in the court, an empty dog-kennel, a locked dairy, a broken pump, which would not yield the wanderer so much as the refreshment of a draught of spring water.

"A tramp!" exclaimed Mr. Champion, with displeasure. "I'm afraid you encourage such vermin by your indiscriminate charities, Christabel."

Christabel looked downward with a faint little sigh. If not a miser in theory, Mr. Champion had been a miser in practice; and so restricted was her pocket-money that those indiscriminate charities of which he complained consisted of a stray sixpence now and then bestowed upon some foot-sore vagrant, whose piteous tale touched the tender young heart.

"A tramp!" repeated Mr. Champion: "a pleasant thing for a tramp to have seen those jewels! I'll put them away this moment, and do you look out again, Christabel, and see if you can discover any one lurking about; and you might tell David to keep his eyes open."

David was the solitary gardener and out-of-door man, who had the custody of grounds that could have been barely kept in order by six.

Miss Champion stepped out into the garden again under a darkening sky, and this time looked more closely than before, making a circuit of the shrubbery by a path half choked with the wild growth of neglected shrubs, going round into the old Dutch garden, glancing even into the kitchen-garden beyond, where she found David staring pensively into a broken cucumber frame.

To him she gave her father's order, which he received almost contemptuously.

"Tramps, miss! Lor' a mercy, they don't do no harm. There's nothing for 'em to steal."

Of course the intruder, whoever he might be, must have had ample time to make his escape after Mr. Champion first took alarm. David prowled slowly through the gardens, stared across a massive holly hedge into the park, saw no one, and wended his solitary way to the house to report accordingly.

CHAPTER III.

CHRISTABEL met Rosa Greenwood next morning in one of the green lanes beyond the village when she was returning from a long ramble on Gilpin, and that young lady told her of a croquet party that was to take place at New Rudderford Hall that evening, and to which she must certainly come.

"It's not the least bit in the world a party, you know, dear," Miss Greenwood pleaded, patting Gilpin's iron gray shoulder; "quite an impromptu affair got up for Miss Perkington, only daughter of the great firm of Perkington & Tanberry, cloth manufacturers, who is staying with us. Such a dear girl! not exactly pretty, but so interesting. We all want Frank to marry her, and I really think she likes him. But there's no knowing: young men are so peculiar."

Christabel wore a straw hat with a blue veil, and under the blue veil the roses on her cheeks deepened a little at this juncture.

"Now you must, must, must come, Christabel. I won't accept a refusal. The rectory girls are to be with us. We are to dine at five, so as to secure a long evening, and begin croquet at six; and we can wind up with a waltz or two before supper."

Christabel's eyes quite sparkled at the idea of a waltz. Dancing was a dissipation which seemed to her inexperience the height of earthly felicity. She had waltzed all by herself on the lawn many a summer evening, softly singing some languorous melody of D'Albert's as she danced.

"I should dearly like to come," she said, thoughtfully, "but I don't know if papa—"

"Papa! bosh!" exclaimed Miss Greenwood, who was somewhat fast and irreverent in her notions of parental authority. "I should like to see the author of my being putting a spoke in the wheel if I wanted to enjoy myself. As if your life wasn't dull enough, mewed up in that dreary old Hall!" And Miss Greenwood made a wry face, which expressed her supreme contempt for the grand old Tudor mansion, as compared with the smart plate-glass-windowed habitation which sheltered her fair self.

"I'll ask papa if I may come at eight," said Christabel. "He dines at seven, you know, and he always likes to have me with him at dinner. I couldn't possibly come till eight; but the evenings are so long now."

"It's a great deal too late," replied Rosa, flicking a fly off Gilpin's nose. "However, if you must stop to see that curious old pa of yours eat his dinner, you must. But remember we shall expect you at eight sharp. I'll send Frank to meet you at the field gate."

"Oh, please don't," cried Christabel.

"But I please shall. He'll meet you at the gate when the clock strikes eight."

Miss Champion walked her horse to the end of the lane, Rosa Greenwood walking by her side, telling her about that wonderful young person, Miss Victoria Perkington, who, by virtue of her position as the only daughter of Perkington & Tanberry, had an allowance which made the condition of the rich Misses Greenwood seem absolute penury.

"You should see the dresses she has brought with her for a ten days' visit!" exclaimed Rosa. "A basket as big as a house, and all of them from a Frenchwoman in Bruton Street. There's a corded black silk trimmed with white lace—Valenciennes—three inches deep on all the flounces and puffings; worth a fortune: a perfect duck of a dress!"

Christabel thought of her jewels, and wished that she could have melted just a few of those diamonds, which she could never wear till she was married, into silk dresses. She gave a little sigh, thinking of the scantiness of her wardrobe, and how very poor a figure she must needs seem in the eyes of Miss Perkington, and rode slowly home, meditative, and not altogether happy.

"I dare say he will marry her," she said to herself. "It is just as papa said last night. The richer people are, the more eager they are to increase their wealth. He will marry her, no doubt, and buy some great estate in the neighborhood, and build a big ugly house; and I shall see them riding by on their thorough-bred horses, and laughing at poor old Gilpin."

She bent over her horse's neck to pat him at this thought, and one childish tear dropped upon the gray mane. She was not much more than a child, and Frank Greenwood had been very tender and deferential in his manner to her always. It gave her a sharp pain to think that he would pass quite out of her life, and belong to Miss Perkington.

"Would you object to my going to play croquet at—at the new Hall this evening, papa?" the girl asked, timidly, during dinner.

"Object? Well, my dear, you know I detest those Greenwood people"—it is doubtful if he had seen them three times in his life—"but I suppose it would be hard upon you to forbid your enjoying any little pleasure they may offer you in a quiet way. It is not a party, of course?"

"Oh no, papa. I only heard of it from Rosa when I was out this morning."

"Mind, I set my face absolutely against your appearance at any of their ostentatious parties. I'll not have my daughter paraded at Samuel Greenwood's chariot wheels. But as far as a game of croquet goes, if it pleases you, I've no objection."

"Thanks, dear papa."

"When are you going?"

"Directly after dinner."

"That will be eight o'clock. I shall send David for you at half past nine."

Only an hour and a half! Would there be time for those waltzes on the lawn? She had danced several times with Frank at that hospitable rectory, and knew that he was an agreeable partner.

"There is to be a kind of supper, I believe, papa," she faltered.

"A kind of supper? Say ten, then, or half past at the latest."

"Thank you, papa dear."

"Bless my heart! one would think these people were the most congenial acquaintance you could desire."

"The rectory girls are to be there, papa," Christabel said, demurely.

"Well, I don't wonder at your being attached to them. Run away, child, and dress yourself. I can finish my dinner alone."

Miss Champion kissed her father, and tripped away to make her brief toilette; pleased, and yet with a vague pain at her heart—a pain that was associated with the image of the unknown Miss Perkington. Rosa Greenwood had called her brother "peculiar" in a tone that seemed to imply his indifference to the great heiress; but she had not said the marriage was at all unlikely; and the family wished it; and Miss Perkington was there; and Frank was a man of the world—very bright and clever and open-hearted, but a man of the world nevertheless.

She put on her white muslin dress—a dress three summers old, which had been lengthened artfully, but not quite imperceptibly, to suit her increasing height; just such a dress as must of necessity provoke contempt in the mind of Miss Perkington, who, of course, had never in her life worn any thing lengthened or "let out." She tied a broad blue ribbon round her slim white throat, with the gold heart-shaped locket hanging to it, and then looked at herself in the glass discontentedly. It was a very beautiful picture which she saw in that old-fashioned cheval-glass—a tall, slender, white-robed figure, and a fair young face framed in luxuriant auburn hair; but Christabel only saw the deficiencies of her costume, and turned away from the glass with a sigh.

Her father was dozing in his deep arm-chair when she peeped into the saloon to bid him good-by; so she went lightly out of the window, and away through the gardens, into a meadow where a solitary cow was browsing in the still evening atmosphere, and on to that field gate of which Miss Greenwood had spoken; a gate that divided Samuel Greenwood's territory from the shrunken lands of the Champions.

Rudderford church clock chimed the three-quarters after seven as Christabel crossed the meadow. She was just a quarter of an hour before the appointed time. She was half glad, half sorry, to think that Frank would not be there.

He was there, nevertheless—a good-looking young fellow, with long legs, sitting on the gate in a contemplative attitude, thinking so profoundly that he looked up with a start as the light footstep came close to him—a start, and something like a blush.

"How good of you to come so early!" he said, as they shook hands, and he held the little hand an extra moment or so. (It was just the sort of meeting in which a young man would consider himself entitled to one gentle pressure before he released a pretty girl's hand.) "I strolled over here ten minutes ago to have a good think. I don't often think: it's a bad habit."

Christabel laughed. She was almost always gay in his presence; he seemed to brighten her life somehow with a genial influence.

"You must have been obliged to think at Oxford," she said.

Francis Greenwood had taken honors at Oxford a year or so before.

"Not the least in the world. One's tutor does that sort of thing for one. I used to read with a man—a duodecimo edition of Porson in his way; drank like a fish, and knew no end of Greek. When I came to a stiffish passage in Aristotle, I used to throw myself back in a chair and light my cigar. 'Just help yourself to another s.-and-b., and be good enough to demonstrate that proposition, old fellow; I don't seem to see it,' I used to say; and the dear old bloke would prose away for half an hour, and if I didn't understand it after that, I threw my book at his head and gave it up."

"Was s.-and-b. a dictionary?" Christabel asked, naïvely.

"No, Miss Champion, but a wonderful enlightener of the human understanding—soda-water and brandy."

"I'm afraid you led quite a dreadful life at the university."

"Not at all; it was very nice. I should hardly mind leading it over again, only it was not so nice as—"

"As what?" Christabel asked, when he came to a dead stop.

"As the life I hope to lead by-and-by."

Her heart sank all at once. That meant his life in the big ugly house that he was to build for himself, and in which he was to set up as a country squire, enriched with the wealth of Perkington & Tanberry. Christabel knew that he was an ardent lover of field sports, and all pursuits that country gentlemen affect, and that he had a vast capacity for spending money. What more natural than that he should be tempted by Miss Perkington's half million or so?

She was silent. They had one wide meadow to cross, a meadow where the newly cut grass was fragrant in the still June air, and they would be in the grounds of the new Hall—grounds in which there were very few trees, but a great deal of ornamentation in the way of costly shrubs of divers spiky orders, and winding gravel-paths that were kept with rigorous care. They could hear the sharp click of the croquet balls as they crossed the meadow, and shrill feminine laughter.

"It was very rude of you to leave your side so long," said Christabel.

"My side? Oh, to be sure, those everlasting croquet players. Do you know, I think croquet the most duffing—I beg your pardon—the most uninteresting game in the world. A man plays it for the sake of loafing with a girl he likes; I can't see any other attraction in it."

"I suppose you have been loafing with Miss Perkington," said Christabel, with a forced little laugh.

Frank Greenwood looked at her curiously.

"Yes," he answered, coolly, "I have been loafing with Miss Perkington a good deal lately;" and then he looked at her again.

They were at the iron gate by this time—only a little iron fence divided the grounds from the meadow. Between the lawn and the fence there was that part of the garden called, par excellence, a shrubbery—a scanty grove of the spiky tribe, and young pink hawthorn-trees, as thick in the trunk as a gandin's umbrella, and guelder-roses dotted about at intervals—a shrubbery in which there was not covert for a rabbit. Christabel felt that the eyes of all the players on the croquet ground were upon her, as she traversed the meandering gravel-walks with Frank by her side.

The lawn was as smooth and as level as a billiard-table, and there was not so much as a faded leaf among the flower beds—brilliant pyramids of bloom, rising tier upon tier in rings of contrasting color, or waving in and out in ribbon bordering. The croquet ground lay on one side of the house, and scattered around it there were iron seats and tables for the accommodation of loungers and lookers-on. Samuel Greenwood was sitting here, smoking his after-dinner cigar and reading the Times—a big bald-headed man, who might once have been like Frank.

He did not look particularly pleased when Christabel came to shake hands with him, smiling shyly, and he gave his son a side-glance that was not altogether agreeable.

"Oh, how d'ye do, Miss Champion?" he said. "I didn't know you were to be here this evening."

"Good gracious me, pa!" exclaimed the irreverent Rosa, "as if we should take the trouble to tell you who was coming to play croquet! Come, Chris, you're to be on our side—Harry and I" (short for Harriet), "Julia Lee" (the rector's daughter), "and you; Miss Perkington, Frank, Clara Lee, and Patty on the other side. Now then, first red; get on— Oh, I forgot to introduce you two girls. Miss Perkington, Miss Champion; Miss Champion, Miss Perkington; aristocracy and plutocracy, Old Rudderford Hall and the Beeches, Leamington; and now you know all about each other, and I expect you to be good friends immediately."

Miss Perkington bowed stiffly. She did not quite relish such a free-and-easy introduction, but her dear Rosa had such eccentric ways. She was a tall, thin young woman, of an order that is called stylish, with a good many sharp angles that were artfully toned down by the flouncings and puffings of a French dress-maker; a young woman with a complexion of the kind that is vulgarly called "tallowy," cold gray eyes, a short nondescript nose, and a heavy lower jaw. She had good white teeth, a profusion of black hair, and she held herself well; but it took a large amount of millinery to make Victoria Perkington attractive.

It was not altogether pleasant to Christabel, that game at croquet. In all their previous sport she had had Frank always on her side, achieving wonders by combined dexterity and dishonesty, now boldly pushing her ball to a point of vantage with the toe of his boot, anon calmly pocketing it to avoid the perils of an adversary's croquet; and they had had such fun, such perpetual giggling, such little secrets and mutual iniquities. This evening they played a rigorous game. Miss Perkington belonged to a croquet club at Leamington, and would stand no nonsense. She played two hours every afternoon throughout the croquet season, just as regularly as she practiced Czerny's exercises on the piano two hours every morning. She had a stroke like a sledge-hammer, and never missed a hoop; so she very soon became a rover, and in that capacity kept a sharp eye upon her ally, Mr. Francis Greenwood. He had not the smallest opportunity for talking to Christabel, even if he had wished to do so, and poor Christabel fancied that he did not wish. He seemed to be upon quite confidential terms with Miss Perkington. He was, in fact, a young man who could hardly help making himself agreeable to women, and had that semi-flirting manner which some young men cultivate.

Miss Champion played abominably—suffered herself to be croqueted off the face of the earth, as it were, to the extreme indignation of Rosa Greenwood. The Perkington side won with flying colors. Oh, how poor Christabel hated the eau de Nile dress, with its innumerable flounces and frillings, the point lace collar, the Cluny borderings, and all the Perkington caparisons, as that sole daughter of the house of Perkington & Tanberry kept rustling to and fro, sending adverse balls to the farthest limits of space with a cold-blooded ferocity that set Miss Champion's teeth on edge!

When the second game had finished, with dire defeat for Christabel's party, and it was about as dark as ever it is at midsummer, with the stars shining out one by one from a deep blue sky, Rosa and one of those useful rectory girls went into the drawing-room and played the famous "Mabel" waltzes. The piano had been wheeled into the bay, and the music floated out through the three tall windows, open from floor to ceiling.

Two of the girls waltzed together, and Frank was still Victoria Perkington's partner. He had scarcely asked her to dance: she had appropriated him as a matter of course.

"If I am to dance, I suppose it is to be with you," she said, with her little supercilious laugh, "since you are our only danseur."

She waltzed very well, with all her canvas spread; waltzed too well, Francis Greenwood thought, for he was waiting for her to be done up, in order that he might get just a turn or so with Christabel. She gave him no opportunity for this, however, as she contrived to hold him in conversation—fade society talk about people they both knew at Leamington; but oh, it sounded so confidential, so tender even, to Christabel's listening ears!—during the pauses in which Miss Perkington condescended to rest, and then went off again like a steam-engine refreshed.

When Frank did at last make his escape, and cross the lawn in quest of Christabel, a shrill voice from the bay-window called out "Supper!" and he was obliged to abandon all hope of that longed-for waltz.

He offered Miss Champion one arm, and gave the other to one of the rectory girls. These were visitors for the evening, and Miss Perkington was staying in the house, and was, in a manner, a member of the family. The fair Victoria rewarded him with a very black look, notwithstanding, when they all came crowding into the brilliantly lighted dining-room, where Samuel Greenwood sat at the head of his table, with an Aberdeen salmon à la mayonnaise before him, a huge silvery fish lying in a bed of greenery, with a bristling hedge of prawns.

"Come here, Victoria, my dear," he said, pointing to the chair on his right: "Frank, you'll sit next to Miss Perkington; Miss Lee, you come on my left."

He took no notice of Christabel; but that contumacious Frank put her coolly into the chair next his own, and so seated himself between Miss Perkington and her rival.

The heiress of Perkington & Tanberry retired into herself. Frank tried to divide his attentions between the two girls; but Miss Perkington only answered him with icy monosyllables, and pretended to consider all his attempts at general conversation directed solely to Christabel. She scarcely touched her salmon, declined lobster salad, would have nothing to say to cold chicken or pine-apple cream, left the moselle to waste its fragrance on the desert air, and sat trifling moodily with half a dozen monster strawberries.

Her ill temper seemed to communicate itself to Mr. Greenwood, senior, who looked daggers at his son from time to time. The other girls were uneasy. Christabel, who had brightened and sparkled into new life at the beginning of the feast, found out suddenly, in the midst of an animated little discussion, that she and Frank were the only talkers, and grew silent immediately.

The great ormolu and malachite clock upon the chimney-piece struck the half hour after ten.

"Oh, if you please," she whispered to Frank, "I ought to go away directly, if Mr. Greenwood would not think me rude. David was to come for me at half past ten—the gardener, you know—and papa might be angry if I were to stay later."

"David is a nuisance," said Frank, in his free-and-easy manner; "though our society is not so entertaining that you need regret leaving it. I shall see you home, of course."

"Oh no, pray don't think of that; there's really no occasion."

"There is occasion. You might meet a gang of poachers poaching eggs, or something, and what would David be among so many? There's that fellow they call Black Simeon—the man who got seven years for a burglary at Little Thorpington—has come back to Rudderford. I saw him prowling about the village yesterday, half-seas-over. A regular bad lot, that fellow is. Of course I shall come with you. David can walk behind and contemplate the stars. I dare say he knows Orion and the Pleiades as well as that fellow in 'Lockesley Hall,' whose knowledge of the heavenly bodies doesn't seem to have been stupendous."

The advent of the in-door man from the rectory to fetch the Misses Lee was announced at this moment, so the girls all rose together. A maid who had spirited away Christabel's hat brought it back; and after a very cool good-night from Samuel Greenwood, who sat scowling at the mutilated salmon, and the stiffest possible bow from Miss Perkington, Miss Champion departed with Frank for her escort.

"Miss Champion has a servant, I believe, Frank," Mr. Greenwood said, sternly.

"I know she has," answered his undutiful son; "but I'm going to see her safe across the meadows, for all that."

Oxford was always too much for Birmingham in any encounter between those two. The commercial magnate had spent three or four thousand pounds upon his son's education, and it seemed to him at odd times that the only tangible produce of that investment was an extensive vocabulary of university slang, and an agreeable placidity of manner which set paternal authority at naught. The young man was not altogether an undutiful son, however, and owned occasionally that his father wasn't "half a bad fellow."

CHAPTER IV.

THE moon had risen while they were losing the calm sweetness of the night in the gas-lit dining-room. The bright, full, summer moon had risen, and all the spiky trees in the shrubbery were reflected on the smooth grass as if on water; all the flowers in the garden were breathing perfume. Frank and Christabel went out by the drawing-room window, and forgot all about David, who came running after them by-and-by from the servants' hall, where he had been regaled with beer, and questioned artfully about the "queer ways" of his master. He had to come round by back ways and obscure paths, the gardens being sacred from such vulgar feet as his, and thus did not overtake those two until they were half-way across the first meadow; and yet they had dawdled a good deal in the garden, Frank insisting upon picking an especial yellow rose from a standard of his own planting for Christabel.

"You must have one; roses always smell sweeter picked by moonlight," he said. "If you don't find the fact stated in Linnæus, it isn't my fault."

David was a judicious young man. He followed at a respectful distance, and, as Frank had suggested, contemplated, or seemed to contemplate, the sidereal heavens, chewing a twig of hawthorn thoughtfully the while. He allowed an ample margin for loitering at gates; gave Frank so much latitude, in fact, that before they came to the thick wood which made a darkness round Old Rudderford Hall, that undutiful son had asked Christabel to be his wife. Of course he had set out with no such intention; but the moonlight, and the dewy meadows fragrant with new-mown hay, and that judicious David, and a tender sweetness in Christabel's blue eyes, had been too much for him, and the words had come of their own accord somehow, he hardly knew how.

Was he sorry when she looked up at him with those sweet eyes brimming over with happy tears, and murmured, shyly,

"I thought you were going to marry Miss Perkington!"

"Not for millions on millions, darling!" he cried, not sorry, but rapturously glad, clasping the slender figure to his breast, raining down kisses on the fair young face.

David drew nearer at this juncture, still intent upon astronomical study, but with the air of thinking he might be wanted presently.

Frank took the hint, released the trembling girl, quite confounded by surprise and joy, and put a little hand through his arm with the calmest air of appropriation.

"It's all settled, darling," he said; "I shall call upon your father to-morrow."

"Oh, Mr. Greenwood!"

"Mr. Greenwood! If you say that again, I shall kiss you again, in spite of David."

"Frank, then."

How sweet it was to say it! how sweet it was to hear it!—sweetness known to youth only that loves and is beloved for the first time. After six or seven such experiences that sort of thing is apt to become commonplace. It is like one's first watch, one's first Derby-day, one's first white-bait dinner.

"I'm sure your father will never let you marry me, Frank," said Christabel.

"I should like to see myself asking my governor's permission," replied the young man. "He ought to be proud of my getting such a chance—marrying a girl of a grand old family like yours; Brummagem allying itself to the Middle Ages: counting-house getting a leaf in Burke's 'County Families.'"

"But we are so poor," remonstrated Christabel. "At least—"

"A lift in the social scale is better than money, my dearest. I can take out letters patent and call myself Greenwood-Champion by-and-by. That would look well upon our pasteboards, wouldn't it, Belle?"

They were in the deep shadow of the trees by this time. Not a glimmer of light was visible in the old house. All the lower windows were closely guarded by heavy oak shutters. They went to a little door—not the principal entrance, but a low arched door in a side tower—and David rang a bell, which made a tremendous clanging half a mile away, as it seemed. They had to wait a considerable time before any one answered this summons, very much to Frank's satisfaction. He was whispering schemes about their future life into Christabel's ear, just as if they had been engaged a twelvemonth; while David looked up at the dark, ivy-covered walls, as if calculating the sparrows' nests.

Some one came at last—much too soon for Francis Greenwood. Slipshod feet shuffled along a stone passage, uncertain hands fumbled with locks and bolts, and the door being opened cautiously, revealed the ancient butler in a semi-somnambulistic condition.

"Lard, but you be late, Miss Chrissy," he said—he had helped to nurse her in her motherless babyhood. "Your pa's gone to bed ever so long."

"I'm glad of that," Christabel whispered to her lover.

"Why, sweetest?"

"Because I never could have told him; and if he had seen my face, he might have found out—"

"He shall hear all about it to-morrow, darling. I shall call at one o'clock."

"And I shall ride Gilpin away to the other end of the world. I couldn't bear to be in the house while—while—"

"While I am in the dock," said the young man, laughing. "I think the verdict will be a favorable one, Chrissy."

"Oh, you don't know," cried Christabel, dolefully.

"I don't know what, dear?"

"How prejudiced papa is against your family, because of the new Hall being built upon land that once belonged to this, and the estate having been cut up and spoiled so to make your grounds. Those meadows of yours were a part of our park once."

"That isn't our fault, darling, but that improvident old Champion's. Who knows but what the two estates might be joined somehow one of these days? My father could buy himself another place; and we'd cut off the new Hall with the smallest possible allowance of garden, and restore this dear old barn"—so lightly did young Oxford speak of a perfect specimen of Tudor architecture—"to its original splendor."

The sleepy butler coughed faintly, as if to remind them of his infirmities and the lateness of the hour. It was nearly midnight by this time—that walk across the fields had lasted so long. The lovers clasped hands, and said good-night; and Frank would fain have made this last good-night a long business, only there was the butler with his guttering tallow-candle and his piteous expostulating look, and David in the rear yawning audibly. So, with one warm pressure of the little hand, he let her go, and the stout old door closed upon her, like the jaws of a monster that had just swallowed her up.

Francis Greenwood turned away with a sigh, putting his hand in his waistcoat pocket mechanically to give David backshish. But David had vanished, and the court-yard was empty. He looked about him meditatively, in no humor to go back to the common world just yet. The wind was sighing faintly among the ivy leaves, with a sound scarce louder than the breathing of a quiet sleeper; the black wall of the old house rose high above him, the shadow of it fell upon him like a pall.

"What a dismal place for my pet to live in!" he said to himself; and then began to wonder which was her room, and to watch for the glimmer of a light from one of those upper casements.

It came presently; a feeble twinkle, which flitted along a corridor, shining faintly from a row of narrow windows, and then stopped and grew steady in a window at the end of the house. This was his darling's chamber, the young man thought, rapturously. It might have been the butler's, but fortunately was not; that functionary—who might have had his pick of twenty vacant rooms—preferring to inhabit a darksome den in the steep sloping roof, where he burrowed like a rabbit. It really was Christabel's room.

Rudderford church clock struck twelve while the lover still stood gazing, and at that very moment, as if conjured into being by the last stroke of the mystic hour, the figure of a man came suddenly from behind an angle of the wall.

"Who the deuce are you?" cried Frank, darting forward.

But the figure had vanished. There was a labyrinth of out-buildings on that side of the house. Frank followed, and prowled round about them, peering into every corner, but could find no trace of that midnight intruder. There is always a nook into which that sort of gentry can screw itself. His search was so close and thorough that he began at last to fancy his own senses must have deceived him, and that the figure had been only a creature of the imagination. He was not easily satisfied, however. The jewel in that old Tudor casket was to his mind so rare a gem that no care or watchfulness could be too much in him, whose privilege it was to guard it. He made a complete circuit of the house, trying windows and shutters. On the lower story all was secure as the casements of a beleaguered fortress, close guarded from the foe. If Anthony Champion had been the owner of hoarded millions, he could scarcely have protected himself better from possible burglars.

One o'clock struck before Frank Greenwood left the precincts of the old Hall, and walked slowly away toward the meadows.

CHAPTER V.

CHRISTABEL was almost too happy after that midnight parting. There was no depressing influence to-night in the gloom and silence of her ancient home. All the burden of her loneliness, which she had borne so meekly, was lifted away in a moment, and her future life lay radiant before her, like a garden in fairy-land. She was a little anxious about her father, and his strong prejudices against the race of Greenwood; but her lover appeared to her altogether so fascinating and irresistible that she could not imagine any body proof against his influence. Her father would like and admire him, of course, just as she did, and would abandon all his prejudices and accept him as her lover. And Miss Perkington! Christabel laughed aloud—a little happy laugh that startled the silence of the old room—at the thought of that young lady's ignominious defeat; all the silk flounces and lace frillings counting for nothing in the eyes of true love.

She was much too happy to think of sleep for ever so long, although it was past midnight, but paced the room, with her hands clasped in a joyous reverie, thinking of the wondrous fortune that had befallen her. Only a retired manufacturer's son, it is true; but then she loved him, and he seemed to her the one most perfect creature in all the world—so bright, so generous, so brave, so true. She had known so few people, had lived a life so utterly lonely, that it is scarcely strange she should believe in the one sunny-natured young fellow who had praised and loved her.

Here she stopped before the tall narrow old glass, and looked at herself half wonderingly.

Was she really pretty? was she worthy of such a lover? She shook out her long loose hair. Yes; she was like a picture of Patient Grisel she remembered seeing years ago in a famous collection.

The clock struck one before she lay down; and then, overcome suddenly by sleep in the midst of her happy thoughts, she threw herself down, dressed as she was, upon a sofa, to rest a little before going seriously to bed; and thereupon fell into a deep slumber, which seemed likely to last all night.

She had one bad habit, engendered perhaps of long lonely days, with much time for thoughtfulness and waking dreams—the habit of walking in her sleep. It was not a thing that happened to her often, but once in a way: two or three times in a year, perhaps, when her mind had been in any way disturbed during the day, she had been wont to wander. The servants had met her at daybreak, sometimes in the corridor, or out on the broad square landing beyond, or on the stairs even, descending, ghost-like, with open, unseeing eyes. One luckless country lass, taking her for the ghost of that slaughtered lady whose spirit was reported to haunt the Hall, had fled shrieking to the kitchen, where she fell into violent hysterics, clutching the air, and well-nigh strangling herself with her sobs and screams.

And so it happened to-night. Toward three o'clock, just as the moon was waning, the girl rose from her sofa, pushed open the door, which she had left ajar, and went out into the corridor—a tall white figure faintly visible in the dim light.

She went straight on to an angle of the corridor where there was a narrow window cut in a part of the wall where the ivy grew thickest. As she came slowly forward, this window was opened by a stealthy hand, and a man thrust his head and shoulders through the window.

He was on the point of leaping through, when his eyes—evil eyes they were, too—fell upon that mysterious figure, with the white dress and loose flowing hair, the figure he had heard of many a time, when folks talked of the ghost that haunted Old Rudderford Hall.

He dropped his stick with an ejaculation. The fall of the jagged stake, cut from a hedge, and trimmed with a rough, hasty hand, upon the uncarpeted oak floor awakened Christabel. She gave a loud shriek, and stared at the intruder, transfixed. That shriek was alarming enough; but it reassured him. He sprang into the corridor, and clapped his great horny hand upon her mouth.

"What! it's you, is it?" he exclaimed, in a cautious voice. "Hold your row, or I shall have to quiet you with my clasp-knife. What brings you prowling about at this time of night, I wonder? After that chap that was prowling outside an hour ago, I suppose. Come, young lady, you just walk into your own room, and keep yourself to yourself. I've got business to do here."

He had tied a big bird's-eye handkerchief across the girl's mouth—she was not fully awake yet, and had only a confused sense of peril and horror—and had just produced another, with a view to tying it round her wrists, when a great crash of glass sounded close behind him, and Frank Greenwood sprang through the open window, smashing the casement as he came through.

Love is so foolish, so full of morbid doubts and apprehensions! He had come back to the old Hall, after crossing the meadows on his way home, not able to feel comfortable about that lurking figure which he had seen at midnight, and had come back just in time to rescue his betrothed from the clutch of a ruffian, and to save the Champion diamonds—a very valuable portion of his future wife's dowry.

The man was Black Simeon, the poacher. He had been lurking about the night before, when Mr. Champion showed his daughter the family jewels, had seen the gems and where they were kept, and had hidden himself in the shrubbery when Christabel came out to reconnoitre. To-night he had tried all the lower doors and windows, and finding entrance below impossible, had clambered up the ivy to this casement at the end of the corridor, trusting to his good luck to grope his way down stairs to the library.

The intent but not the deed confounded him. He was pinioned and locked in an empty wine-cellar that night, and handed over to the local authorities at breakfast-time, to appear by-and-by, charged with a burglarious attempt, and to return to that state of bondage from which he had so lately emerged.

Anthony Champion could hardly be uncivil to the man who had saved his daughter and the family diamonds; and Frank Greenwood really was a nice young fellow, with free-and-easy, irresistible ways. He brought brightness and life into the gloomy old house, and in an incredibly short time persuaded the master of Old Rudderford Hall to waive his prejudices against the inmates of New Rudderford Hall.

When Frank had smoothed the way by his artful management, he coolly ordered his father to call upon Mr. Champion to entreat that gentleman's consent to the union of the two houses. The manufacturer was furious, and there was a scene; but a very brief one. Frank's supreme coolness made light of every thing. Miss Perkington had departed before this in silent disgust, with all her baggage. Samuel Greenwood was fain to give way; it evidently mattered so very little to his son whether he did or not.

"I can always make a living at the bar," said young Oxford, in his careless way, "and there's the five hundred a year my poor mother left me. I should like to have made an amicable arrangement, and secured your co-operation for restoring the old Hall; but if it isn't to be, why it isn't; you know best; and we sha'n't starve."

Samuel fretted and fumed, swore an oath or two, and succumbed. He went to call upon Mr. Champion with lamb-like meekness, and returned crest-fallen.

Mr. Champion was prepared to waive all consideration of the wide difference between the status of the two families, and to consent to the marriage. He could give his daughter fifty thousand pounds, and jewels worth at least twenty-five thousand more. Mr. Greenwood had supposed him to be a pauper.

"It has been my fancy to live like this," he said, "and allow the surplus of my income to accumulate for my only child."

And so they were married, and were just the sort of couple to live happily ever afterward.

THIS picturesque toilette, from a new Paris model, is very effective at the opera or concert, and combines the three colors now so much in vogue. The under-skirt is of ciel blue faille, trimmed with a gathered flounce, which is surmounted by a bias fold and pleating. Princesse over dress of apricot faille, trimmed with ruches of ciel blue faille, and edged with lace round the neck. Half-flowing sleeves of apricot faille, slashed and underlaid with puffings of white silk, and trimmed with blue faille ruches. Bodice of white silk, forming a square neck with the over dress, and trimmed with ruches of blue faille and lace. The over dress is looped much higher on the left side than the right by means of the ruches. Blue silk slippers. Blue enamel and gold jewelry. Hair roped with pearls.

LADIES' HOUSE AND STREET DRESSES.

MISS PERT.

A YOUNG person with a spirit, and no diffidence in showing it, whatever her relative age or social condition; a young person who, in her resolve not to be put upon generally, refuses every kind of friendly or parental advice, and so goes her own willful way into divers bogs and quagmires, whence she does not always emerge with clean garments; a young person who is very like an unbroken filly with the bit between her teeth, when, pull as you may, you will come off second best, and with more bone-ache than success; a young person with a distinct idea, boldly expressed, that all discipline is tyranny and all education slavery, and that she has been sent into this world in a glorious independence of either, consecrated to what she calls her individuality, without regard to general policy or convenience; a young person with the special privilege of going headlong on the road to destruction if she likes, without accepting the consequences of her method of procedure, or falling into the pit which lies to the left side of the way—where she is walking; a young person with decided opinions on most matters, and the frankest contempt for all who differ from her; a young person who has verve, energy, and quickness enough to be very charming if she chose, but who has chosen instead to be just as disagreeable as she might be the reverse. This is Miss Pert seen at a distance, and considered in the broader outlines of her character. Close at hand, she is none the more beautiful, none the more alluring.

Miss Pert has parts; her worst enemies can not call her stupid, though her best friends must confess that she is shallow. She is one of the hot-pressed, who do not give themselves time for study; consequently all she knows is by hearsay and light reading—odds and ends picked up by frothy talk with the better informed, or by that curious kind of thing, so general in the present day, a "popular account" in an illustrated magazine. Her sources of information are quite sufficient for Miss Pert; and, knowing nothing better, she is conscious of no loss in herself, but on the contrary is vividly conscious of her superiority when she meets her slower sister, who has no pretensions, and who waits until she knows before she pronounces judgment. Miss Pert pronounces judgment independent of knowledge: and a queer thing she makes of it. In former times—times so long ago as to be quite out of all date, and as old-fashioned as they were ridiculous—fathers and mothers were considered to be something rather respectable than otherwise among their children—nay, persons even to be slightly venerated and believed in, their counsels listened to, and in a measure followed. But in the happy days in which we live Miss Pert and (we must add) her brothers have changed all that. So far as that young person herself goes, the sole use of fathers and mothers is—the one to supply her with money, the other to look after her dresses, and take her to balls and places where she can not go alone. If she can go alone, or only with a younger brother whom she dominates, she prefers it; for mamma is apt to be tiresome and interfering, and has even had the bad taste sometimes to publicly rebuke her, and pull hard at the bit between her teeth. She doesn't mind, you know, for what mamma says; why should she? but it is awfully disgusting, all the same. Mamma is so old-fashioned! She does not understand things; and what was all very well for her when she was a girl, won't do now when the generation of Miss Perts has the lead! As for papa, he is simply an obstructive, and to be shunted as speedily as possible. Of course they can not get on without him, for they must have money, and he must make it; but if the old dear will only be contented to do that, and then leave the spending of it to her and her brothers, he would be all very well. If he wishes to have a hand on the rein, he is even more tiresome than mamma, and it is harder work to quarrel with him.

Poor Miss Pert! what will life do for her? Reduce her chaotic nature into order? discipline her? mellow her? or will it leave her as she is now, all points and angles and self-assertion and vanity and ignorance, merely hardening her into her present form, making her youthful extravagances the eccentricities of maturity, and sending her through life a doomed old maid, loved by none, feared by many, and laughed at by all who can separate shallow insolence from the effective opposition of knowledge and grave judgment? If it was sure to be the former, we might easily forgive the ugly phase through which she goes in her youth; but, as there are such things as crystallized Misses Pert—Miss Pert as an ancient bogy—we deprecate her continuance, now in her teens, and wish that some good fairy would suddenly show her to herself as she is, when perhaps the sight would so disquiet her that she would cease from her pertness, and learn the value of a meek and humble spirit before too late.

"TOO BAD."

Too bad to gift my idle phrase
With such a black intent,
And malice see where none there was:
You knew, Sir, what I meant.
'Tis always so: if comment pass
Our lips on our own kind,
Some after-thought of jealousy
Men never fail to find.

Too bad it is: you wrong our sex;
We can be generous too.
You carp at woman's friendship, Sir;
Is it alone with you
That common charity exists,
Or friendship's to be had?
You wrong our sex, in truth you do,
Upon my word, too bad!

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

BUT it was very convenient—this illness. It saved her from all need of physical exertion, even of talking. She could just turn her face to the wall, and lie quiet and do nothing. She felt for the first time in her life not the slightest inclination to do any thing. Even when she rose from her bed the same incapacity continued, till sometimes Rosie's innocent prattle was almost too much for her, and she felt herself turning sick and faint, and saw, with a dread indescribable, Madame Arthenay or Grace carry the child away from her, and keep her out of her sight for hours at a time.

What if, by-and-by, this were to be constantly the case? What if this condition of hers was the forerunner of long and serious illness—perhaps the consumption which was said to be in the family, though in this generation her cousin Arthur had been its only victim? Suppose she were to fall sick and die? She began to have a feeling—was it sweet or sad?—that she could die, and that of mere sorrow. And, then, what would become of the child?

"Oh, my Rosie, if over there should come a time when you were left forlorn with nobody to love you, when you might blame poor Tannie for having stolen you and kept you away from all those who might have loved you! If ever Tannie should die!"

"Tannie die? What's dat? Rosie don't like it!" said the little thing to whom she had been talking. She had two ways of talking to her darling. One which Rosie could perfectly comprehend: long conversations about flowers, and beasts, and people, and things, and all sorts of subjects in which the child's intelligence was receptive to a degree that sometimes utterly amazed the grown woman. The other was a trick she had of speaking simply for her own relief, in a fashion that Rosie could not comprehend at all. But, baby as she was, she comprehended the anxious face, the tremulous voice, and repeated, with that pathetic droop of the lips that always foreboded tears, "Rosie don't like it."

Hannah changed her tone immediately. "Come here, my pet; Tannie won't die, then. She couldn't afford it just yet. But listen a minute. Would Rosie like to go and see papa? Be papa's girl again, and play about in the pretty garden, and the greenhouse, and the nursery? Rosie remembers them all?"

"Yes," said the little decisive voice—Rosie never had the slightest doubt in her own baby mind about any thing. "Rosie will go and see papa—soon, very soon. Tannie come too."

Hannah turned away, and could not answer at first. Then she said, "But perhaps Tannie might not come too. Rosie would be content with papa?"

"No"—there was entire decision in this likewise—"Rosie not go to papa unless Tannie come too. Rosie don't want papa. Rosie will stop with Tannie."

And the little woman, squatting down on Tannie's pillow with an air of having quite settled the whole affair, turned her whole undivided attention to a doll, whose eyes would open and shut, and who was much more interesting to her than any papa in the world.

But Rosie's unconscious words aroused in her aunt a dread that had once awakened and been silenced: the fear that, as time went on, this complete severance would produce its natural result; the child would become indifferent to the father, and the father to the child. For, let people talk as they will about the ties of blood, it is association which really produces the feeling which is termed "natural affection." Deprived of this, and then deprived of herself, Rosie might in a few years be left as lonely a creature, save for money, as her aunt Hannah once had been—ay, and was now, save for this one darling, the sole treasure saved out of her wrecked life. But was it lawfully and righteously hers?

There is a story, I believe a true one—most women will feel that it might have been true—of a Highland mother, who, traveling from one glen to another, was caught in a snow-storm, and lost for twenty-four hours. When found—that is, her body was found—she had stripped off every thing but her shift to cover the child. It was alive still, just alive; but the mother, of course, was dead.

Hannah Thelluson, as she lay awake all through this night, the first night that they brought back Rosie's crib to its old place by her bedside—for she insisted she could sleep better if they did so—was not unlike that poor Highland woman.

Next morning she said, in a quiet, almost cheerful tone, "Grace, do you think you could pack up all our things in a day? For I want, if possible, to go back to England to-morrow."

"Go back to England!"

"Yes. What do you say to that, Rosie?" fixing her eyes on the child's face; and then, as a sudden gush blinded them, turning away, and contenting herself with feeling the soft cheeks and the rings of silky hair—as that Highland mother might have done when the death-mists were gathering over her eyes. "Will Rosie go back and see papa, and be papa's own little girl again? Papa will be so fond of her."

"Yes," assented the little oracle, and immediately proved her recollection of her father and her lively appreciation of his paternal duties by breaking her doll's head against the bed-post, and then saying, in a satisfied tone, "Never mind. All right. Rosie take dolly to papa. Papa will mend it!"

In a week from that time, traveling as fast as her strength allowed, yet haunted by a vague dread that it would not last her till she reached England, Hannah arrived in London.

Only in London, at a hotel; for she had no house to go to—no friend. Lady Dunsmore happened to be at a country-seat; but, even if not, it would have been all the same. What she had to do no one could help her in—no one could advise her upon, it must be solely between herself and Bernard. And the sooner it was done the better. She felt this more and more every hour. The struggle was growing frightful.

"I was right," she said to herself, when, as soon as the need for exertion was over, she sank, utterly exhausted, and was obliged to leave to Grace the whole charge of every thing, including the child, and lie, listening to the roll of endless wheels below the hotel window—as ceaseless as the roar of the sea, and as melancholy—"I was quite right! It is best to resign every thing. I can not trust myself any more."

The first minute that her hands ceased from shaking, she wrote the decisive letter.

"DEAR FRIEND" (she first put "Bernard," then "brother," finally "friend." He was that still; at least she had never given him cause to be the contrary),—"I have, against your wish, returned to England, though only for a few days' stay, in consequence of having accidentally discovered the matter to which I suppose your last letter referred; though, as you have never plainly told me, I will not refer to it here. But I think it ought to modify our future arrangements, which I should like to talk over with you. If you will come and see me here, me and Rosie, half an hour would, I think, suffice to decide all, and I could go back to France at once.

"I remain, with every wish for your happiness in your new life, your affectionate friend,

"HANNAH THELLUSON."

After that she had nothing more to do but to wait, and watch day darken into night, and night brighten back into day—the dreary London day, all loneliness and noise—till Sir Bernard came.

He came earlier than she could have believed it possible. He must at once have taken a night train from Easterham, which he owned he had; but, though he looked very tired, he was neither so agitated nor so confused as he might naturally have been under the circumstances.

"Why in the world did you take such a journey, Hannah?" was all he said, on entering; then, perceiving Grace and the child, he stepped back, and caught his little daughter in his arms.

"My pretty one! Run away, nurse, and leave her to me. I want to have her all to myself. What, Rosie! Has she forgotten papa! Two tisses!—lots of tisses! Papa's darling! Papa's lamb!"

Of one thing Hannah was certain, Sir Bernard was unfeignedly glad to see his child. No lack of fatherly love, even though he was going to be married. It gave that poor heart which he had forsaken a thrill of joy to see how tenderly he caressed his little "lamb"—the motherless lamb, that might have perished but for her, and which her care had now nurtured into a creature that, among any number of children, would be always the flower of the flock, so pretty had she grown, so winning, so clever, and withal such a good and loving child. Any father might be proud of Rosie. And as she clung about Sir Bernard, remembering all his old tricks with her, as if they had only parted last week, the two seemed perfectly happy together, and even like one another—with that strange family likeness which comes and goes in little faces, but which Hannah saw now as she had never seen before. Yes, Rosie was decidedly like him, and they would grow up to be a true father and daughter—one of the dearest and sweetest bonds that human nature can know.

She had quite forgotten herself—a trick she had, poor Hannah! in watching them, and speculating upon them and their future—when she felt both her hands taken, one by her child's soft little fingers, the other by the strong clasp of a man.

"Hannah, can you forgive me? I have sometimes feared you never would!"

"What for?"

"For my unreasoning anger—my frantic love; above all, for having asked of you a sacrifice which no man should ask or accept from any woman. I knew this, felt it, the instant I came to my right senses, which was as soon as ever you were out of sight; but it was too late to tell you so. Forgive me. You will have no need to forgive me any thing again."

"I know that," said Hannah, slowly, and waited for the next words he would say—words which would surely be confirmation of all she had heard. So sure was she of it, that she did not withdraw her hand; she even, seeing that his manner was not agitated, but even cheerful, began to think whether now it would not be possible to go back, in degree, to their old cordial relations; whether he could not be again her brother-in-law—and Alice Melville's husband. Still, something in her manner seemed to startle him.

"Know? What can you know? Not, surely, any thing about these future plans of mine, which, for both our sakes, I have carried out, unknown to you, until now?"

"Nevertheless, I have found them out," said Hannah, with a faint smile. "In these things, you see, a bird of the air often carries the matter. I am aware of it all."

"Of it all? Who could have told you? And what?"

"That you are going to be married."

Sir Bernard started; then half smiled. But he offered not the slightest contradiction.

Hannah, perfectly convinced, conscious of only one wild impulse to get through what she had to say, that it might be all over and done, went on speaking.

"Married, as I hear, to Alice Melville, which is a choice that must satisfy every body. That is the reason I came back to England. She is a good woman, who would be a good mother to my child. And I feel very weak and ill. I have been ill—"

"My poor Hannah! And you never told me?"

"Why should I? I only tell you now because it frightens me about Rosie's future. She ought to have safer protection than mine. She ought to have a brighter life than any I can give her. So I came to say"—Hannah drew her breath hard and fast—"if you want her back, I will give her up—to you and Alice. Only, first—I must speak to Alice—must make her promise—"

Just then tiny fingers ringed themselves round Hannah's cold hand, against which Rosie laid her cheek, in a caressing way she had. It was too much—the strong heart altogether gave way, and she sat down sobbing.

Sir Bernard had listened, quite confounded at first, then silently watched her.

"Oh Hannah, you good, good woman!" was all he said, and, taking out of her arms little Rosie, now sobbing as piteously as she, disappeared from the room with the child.

Then it was really true, this marriage: he did not deny it. And he accepted her sacrifice of her darling. Well, once made, she could not retract it, even had she desired to do so. But she did not desire. She only wished to see Rosie safe, and then go away and die. This once, once more, for the last time in her life, she accepted the inevitable. It was God's will, and it must be.

Long before Sir Bernard came back she had dried her eyes, and waited, as she thought she ought to wait, for any thing he had to say—any final arrangements they might require to make. There was a chair opposite, but he sat down beside her and took her hand.

"Hannah, I want to speak half a dozen quiet words to you, which I should not have said till spring, but I had better say them now. It is quite true I am going to be married, and as soon as I possibly can. I am not fitted for a lonely life. Mine will be worthless to myself, my fellow-creatures, my God, unless I accept the blessing He offers me, and marry the woman I love. But that woman is—not Alice Melville."

"Not Alice Melville!"

"How could you ever think it was? She is very good, and we are fast friends—indeed, she has advised with me in all my plans, and we have been very much together of late, which may account for this report. How could you believe it?" and he smiled—his old, winning, half-mischievous smile. "As Rosie would say—by-the-bye, how she has grown, that dear little girl of ours!—'papa don't like it.'"

Hannah had borne sorrow—but she could not bear joy; she was too weak for it. Her lips tried to speak, and failing that, to smile, but it was in vain. She sank, quite insensible, in Bernard's arms.

It was a good many hours before she was able to hear those "half a dozen quiet words" which were to change the whole current of her life—of both their lives.

The plan which Madame Arthenay had first suggested—of naturalizing himself in France, changing his domicile, and marrying as a French citizen, according to French law—had, immediately after his parting from Hannah, recurred again and again to Sir Bernard's mind as the only solution of their difficulty. On consulting the Dunsmores on the subject, they also had seen the matter in the same light. Though session after session Lord Dunsmore determined to bring forward his favorite Bill, still years might elapse before it was passed and became law, and until then there was no hope of marriage in England for Hannah and Bernard.

"You mustn't ask it, or desire it," said Lady Dunsmore, ignorant—and she always remained ignorant—that he ever had asked it. "A woman like her would never consent. And she is right. To break your country's laws, however unjust they may be, and then expect its protection, is like disobeying one's father. We must do it—if compelled by his unjust exactions—but we ought to quit his house first."

So there was no alternative but for Sir Bernard to make the sacrifice—as hard for him as Hannah's renunciation of Rosie had been for her—and give up England forever. His profession likewise—since no man with a conscience could break the canon law, and yet remain a clergyman.

"And I have a conscience, though they do not think so at the Moat House," said he, faintly smiling. That smile and his worn looks alone betrayed to Hannah the sufferings he must have gone through in making up his plans—now all decided, and set in train. In fact he had already renounced every thing, and prepared himself to begin a new career in a foreign land.

"I can do it, in one sense," he continued, "easier than most men—because of my large private fortune. I mean to buy the Château St. Roque, which you liked so much. Did you not say you could cheerfully spend your whole life there? Perhaps you may."

Hannah smiled; and there came across her memory a trembling flash of that pleasant place—with the four towers looking at themselves in the water, and the green upland gardens and meadows on either hand.

"Yes," she whispered, "we could be very happy there. It would not be so very dreadful to live in France, would it?"

"At least, we must not say so to our good friend, Madame Arthenay, or to our new compatriots. And I hope I am not so very insular as to see charms in no country except my own. Besides, am I not re-planting my family tree where its old roots came from? Who knows? Years hence I may revive the glory of my Norman ancestors by making a speech, in my very best French, before the Chamber of Deputies. What say you, Hannah? Shall we shake British dust entirely off our feet, and start afresh as Monsieur and Madame De la Rivière? Great fun that!"

The boyish phrase—and the almost boyish laugh that accompanied it—comforted Hannah more than he knew. Heavy as his heart was now, and sore with his hard renunciations, there was in him that elastic nature which, grief once overpast, refuses to dwell upon it—but lives in the present and enjoys the future. And he was still young enough to have a future—to open up new paths for himself, and carry them out nobly; to live in content and die in honor, even though it was far away from the dear England where he was born.

"But it costs you so much—ah, so much!" said Hannah, mournfully.

"Yes, but I have counted the cost; and—if you will not scold me for saying so—I think you worth it all. Many men become voluntary exiles for the sake of wealth, convenience, or whim: why should not I for love? Love—which is duty also, when one is loved back again."

Hannah smiled, knowing he was one of those whom it makes not conceited or tyrannical, but strong and happy, to be loved back again.

"Besides," he continued, "I have not much love to leave behind: my sisters are all married—Bertha will be next spring. No one will miss me; nor perhaps shall I soon come to miss any thing—except a few graves in Easterham churchyard."

He stopped, and that last bitterness of exile—the clinging to the very sod of one's own land, the sod which covers our dead—came over him, sad and sore. Those graves—buried in them lay all his childhood, his youth, his brief, happy married life with the wife whom—though he seldom spoke of her now—Hannah knew he had no more forgotten than she had forgotten her lost Arthur. Time had healed all wounds: life and its duties had strengthened them both—strengthened them into that calm happiness which sometimes, after much sorrow, God sees fit to send, and which it is good to accept and be thankful for. But—as for forgetting! she said nothing, only drew Bernard's head softly to her shoulder, and let him there weep the tears of which no man need be ashamed.

By-and-by she asked about Bertha's marriage, which was to a gentleman in the neighborhood whom she had refused several times, but accepted at last. He was very rich, if not very clever or very wise.

"Still, she might have done worse. He is a good fellow, and we all like the match, except, perhaps, Melville, who speaks sharply about it sometimes; but Bertha only laughs at him, and says she shall please herself, in spite of brothers-in-law."

Hannah looked keenly at Bernard while he spoke; but he did so in utter unsuspiciousness. Evidently he had never guessed, in the smallest degree, the secret grief of his sister Adeline, the canker of her married life, that jealousy of her sister, from which all the restrictions of the law could not save her, no more than the terror of the Divorce Court can save poor miserable souls to whom vice is pleasanter than virtue. But to this right-minded, honest man, intrenched within the sacredness of a happy marriage, the one idea would have been almost as untenable as the other. Hannah was certain that, dearly as Bernard loved her now, had Rosa lived, she might have come about their house continually, and he would have had no sort of feeling for her beyond the affectionate interest that a man may justly take in his wife's sister, or cousin, or friend—the honorable, chivalric tenderness for all women which only proves how deeply the one woman he has chosen is enshrined in his heart.

So what he had never once suspected she never told him—and no one else was ever likely to do so. Adeline's sufferings were buried with her. So best.

"And now," said Bernard, "I must say good-by. And I shall not see you again till we meet on board the Havre steamer to-morrow."

For he had arranged already that she should go back at once—avoiding the very appearance of evil—and remain with Madame Arthenay until he came to marry her, which, if possible, should be in spring.

"I shall come, like Napoleon, with the violets, and by then we must have these thin cheeks rounded, and these grave eyes looking as bright and merry as Rosie's. I used to say, you know, there was no telling which was most of a baby, Tannie or Rosie. By-the-bye, she must cease to say 'Tannie,' and learn to say 'mamma.'"

Hannah burst into tears.

"Yes, there is one thing I am not afraid of," said she, when her full heart had a little relieved itself of its felicity. "I know I shall be a good mother to your child. What I am afraid of is whether I shall be a sufficiently good wife to you. You might have married almost any woman you liked—young, rich, pretty; while I—look here, Bernard."

She lifted up her hair, and showed him the long stripes of gray already coming—faster than ever since the trouble of the last two years; but he only kissed the place, repeating Cowper's lines, which he reminded her they had often read together in those long, quiet evenings which would all come back again when the one deep and lasting bliss of married life, companionship, would be theirs without alloy—companionship, which even in friendship alone, without marriage, had been so sweet:

"Thy silver locks, once auburn bright,
Are still as lovely to my sight
As golden beams of orient light—
My Mary."

"No, Hannah," he said, "I am not afraid—neither of our new life nor of ourselves. I know what a man marries a woman for—not for this beauty or that, this quality or that peculiarity; but because she suits him, sympathizes with him, is able to make him a better man than he ever was before—as you have made me. If I had let you go, I should have been not only a coward, but a fool. I take you just as you are, 'with all your imperfections on your head,' as I hope you will take me?"

"Yes," she said, laughing, though the tears were in her eyes.

"Very well, then. Let us be content."

He put his arms about her, and stood looking deep down into her eyes. He was much handsomer than she, brighter, and younger-looking; yet there was something in Hannah's face which, with all its handsomeness, his had not—a certain spiritual charm, which, when a man once recognizes it in a woman, is an attraction as mysterious as it is irresistible—makes him crave for her as the one necessity of his existence, risk every thing in order to win her, and, having won her, love her to the last with a passion that survives all change, all decay. What this charm was, probably Bernard himself could not have told; but Lady Dunsmore, speaking of Hannah, once characterized it as being "a combination of the angel and the child."

CHAPTER XVII.

THERE is a picture familiar to many, for it was in the Great Exhibition of 1851, and few stopped to look at it without tears—"The Last Look of Home," by Ford Madox Browne. Merely a bit of a ship's side—one of those emigrant ships such as are constantly seen at Liverpool, or other ports whence they sail—with its long rows of dangling cabbages, and its utter confusion of cargo and passengers. There, indifferent to all, and intently gazing on the receding shore, sit two persons—undoubtedly a man and his wife—emigrants—and bidding adieu to home forever. The man is quite broken down; but the woman, sad as she looks, has hope and courage in her face. Why not? In one hand she firmly clasps her husband's—the other supports her sleeping babe. She is not disconsolate, for she carries her "home" with her.

In the picture the man is—not at all like Bernard, certainly, but the woman is exceedingly like Hannah—in expression at least—as she sat on the deck of the French steamer, taking her last look of dear old England, with its white cliffs glimmering in the moonlight—fainter and fainter every minute—across the long reach of Southampton Water.

Bernard sat beside her—but he too was very silent. He meant to go back again as soon as he had seen her and Rosie and Grace safely landed at Havre; but he knew that to Hannah this farewell of her native land was, in all human probability, a farewell "for good."

Ay—for good—in the fullest sense; and she believed it—believed that they were both doing right, and that God's blessing would follow them wherever they went; yet she could not choose but be a little sad, until she felt the touch of the small, soft hand which now, as ever, was continuously creeping into Tannie's. Then she was content. If it had been God's will to give her no future of her own at all, she could have rested happily in that of the child and the child's father.

It happened to be a most beautiful night for crossing—the sea calm as glass, and the air mild as summer, though it was in the beginning of November. Hannah could not bear to go below, but with Rosie and Grace occupied one of those pleasant cabins upon deck—sheltered on three sides, open on the fourth. There, wrapped in countless rugs and shawls, Rosie being in an ecstasy at the idea of going to bed in her clothes, "all under the tars" ("s" was still an impossible first consonant to the baby tongue), she settled down for the night, with her child in her arms, and her faithful servant at her feet.

Sir Bernard made them all as comfortable and as warm as he could—kissed his child, and Hannah too, in Grace's presence. For he had himself informed the nurse how matters stood, and told her that in his house she should have a home for life, in a country where marriages such as hers were considered honorable, natural, and right. Then he bade them all good-night, and went to the cabin below.

Hannah could not sleep; but she rested quiet and happy. Even happiness could not make her physically strong; but she left all her days to come in God's hands—to be many or few, as He thought best. The others fell sound asleep, one at her bosom, the other at her feet; but she lay wide awake, listening to the lap-lap of the water against the boat, and watching the night sky, so thick with stars. At length the moon came out and looked in upon them like a sweet, calm face, resembling a dead face in its unchangeable peace; so much so, that when Hannah dropped at last into a confused doze, she dreamed it was the face of her sister Rosa smiling down out of heaven upon them all.

When she woke it was no longer moonlight, but daylight—at least daybreak; for she could discern the dark outline of the man at the wheel, the only person on deck. The boat seemed to be passing, swiftly and silently, as a phantom ship through a phantom ocean; she hardly knew whether she was awake or asleep, dead or alive, till she felt the soft breathing of the child in her arms, and, with a passion of joy, remembered all.

A few minutes after, Hannah, raising her head as high as she could without disturbing Rosie, saw a sight which she never saw before, and never in all her life may see again, but will remember to the end of her days.

Just where sea and sky met was a long, broad line of most brilliant amber, gradually widening and widening, as the sun lifted himself out of the water and shot his rays, in the form of a crown, right up into the still dark zenith. Then, as he climbed higher, every floating cloud—and the horizon seemed full of them—became of a brilliant rose-hue, until the whole heaven blazed with color and light. In the midst of it all, dim as a dream, but with all these lovely tints flitting over it, Hannah saw, far in the distance, the line of the French shore.

It was her welcome to her new country and new life—the life which was truly like being born again into another world. She accepted the omen; and, clasping her child to her bosom, closed her eyes and praised God.

* * * * * *

All this happened long ago, and Monsieur and Madame De la Rivière have never returned to England. They still inhabit the Château de Saint Roque, beloved and honored far and wide in the land of their adoption, and finding, after all, that the human heart beats much alike, whether with French blood or English, and that there is something wonderfully noble and lovable about that fine old Norman race which (as Madame Arthenay long delighted in impressing upon her dear neighbors, and upon the many English friends who visited them in their pleasant foreign home) once came over and conquered, and civilized, us rude Saxons and Britons.

Whether the master and mistress of Saint Roque will ever return to England, or whether little Austin, the eldest of their three sons—Rosie is still the only daughter—will ever become not only the heir of their French estates and name, but one day Sir Austin Rivers of the Moat House, remains to be proved. At any rate, they mourn little after that old home, being so thoroughly happy in their new one—as those deserve to be who have sacrificed for one another almost every thing except what they felt to be right. But they are happy, and what more can they or any one desire?

THE END.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Roosevelt Hospital, a noble monument of benevolence, was recently publicly dedicated to its work of charity. The entire hospital covers the whole block between Ninth and Tenth avenues and Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth streets. Built upon the "pavilion plan," with a large central court-yard, this institution will have all the healing advantages of plenty of air and sunshine. Without attempting to give a description of numerous arrangements for the comfort of patients, we will allude only to the excellent contrivances for ventilation—a most important desideratum in a hospital. In addition to the ordinary ventilation from opposite windows, there is what is called ridge ventilation—the impure air being conveyed under the ridge of the roof, and there finding escape. But the principal contrivance is a ventilating chimney, 130 feet high and 16 feet in diameter, inside measure. This chimney has an inner one of iron, like a smoke-pipe of a large steamboat. This smoke-pipe receives the smoke of four large boilers, also all the smoke from the kitchen, bakery, and laundry. The smoke and heat from the boilers are enough to heat the outer chimney, so as to attract all the foul air from the ducts and flues connected with it from all the buildings, and here escapes. As an additional provision for purity of atmosphere the walls and floors have been rendered impervious with four coats of oil-paint, so as to present a surface which can not absorb impurities, and which can be washed with soap and water. The Roosevelt Hospital is not yet fully completed—only the east pavilions being open, which will accommodate 150 patients; when wholly completed, 400 can be supplied with every comfort. While this institution is not entirely free to the public—a reasonable charge for treatment being made to such as can afford to pay for it—a large number of patients will receive gratuitous accommodation and medical treatment.

Information has been received at the Navy Department, Washington, from Dr. A. Petermann, of Gotha, to the effect that in the month of September an open polar sea was found from 42° to 60° east of Greenwich, to the northward of 78° north latitude. The northernmost point reached was 79° north, on the meridian 48° east. Here was found the most favorable state of ice toward the north pole, with probable connection with the open sea, north of Siberia, toward the east. This appears to be the most favorable route toward the north pole.

The decree of emancipation which passed the Brazilian Parliament on September 27 declares free all children born of slaves after its date. It also frees all the slaves held by the government, numbering 1700, establishes an emancipation fund, and makes various other provisions for the benefit of the existing slaves. Religious corporations have already commenced to set at liberty the slaves owned by them, and there are evidences of a movement among the slave-owners in the direction of either converting their slaves into free tenant-farmers or of freeing them upon conditions of a few years' service.

The destruction of the museum of the Chicago Academy of Sciences was not the least among important losses by the great fire. The building was supposed to be fire-proof, but, like other "fire-proof" buildings, collapsed like a bubble in the intense heat. The museum contained the largest collection of crustacea in the world, filling more than ten thousand jars; the specimens and species gathered by Professor J. D. Dana in the Wilkes exploring expedition in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; and also the large collections made by Dr. Stimpson in his cruise in the Ringgold expedition to the North Pacific, besides his recent collections from the Gulf of Mexico, and specimens from various other sources. There were also in the museum, unfortunately, the crustacea dredged up by Mr. De Pourtalès in his late dredging expeditions, these having been sent there for description and a final report.

The salary of President Theirs is six times greater than that of President Grant.

A gentleman in Wilmington, North Carolina, has successfully raised tea, which, as he claims, can not be excelled in flavor by the imported article. Several other sections of the United States seem well adapted to the culture of this plant, particularly South Carolina, Tennessee, and California.

The Scientific American informs us that before 1821 India rubber had been imported only in the form of curiosities. About that time a sea-captain brought home, among other devices, some rubber wrought in the shape of small shoes, and presented them to a bright boy. They were closed at the top, but with child-like curiosity the boy cut them open, and found only some clay within in the form of lasts. His next desire was to put them on his feet, and, as they would not stretch enough, he used boiling water to soften them, and thus succeeded. To color them, he tried ink, which soon washed off, after which he hit upon the plan of smoking them in the chimney. He then had, complete, the first pair of India rubber shoes ever used in this country, and his success was the beginning of a business which now has immense proportions.

A pretty bit of poetry in "Little-folk Songs," evidently the heart-language of a loving mother, will appeal pleasantly to many a mother's heart:

"Ten fat little fingers, so taper and neat!
Ten fat little fingers, so rosy and sweet!
Eagerly reaching for all that comes near,
Now poking your eyes out, now pulling your hair;
Smoothing and patting with velvet-like touch,
Then digging your cheeks with a mischievous clutch;
Gently waving good-by with infantine grace,
Then dragging your bonnet down over your face;
Beating pat-a-cake, pat-a-cake, slow and sedate,
Then tearing a book at a furious rate;
Gravely holding them out, like a king, to be kissed,
Then thumping the window with tightly closed fist;
Now lying asleep, all dimpled and warm,
On the white cradle pillow, secure from all harm.
Oh, dear baby hands! how much love you infold
In the weak, careless clasp of those fingers' soft hold!
Keep spotless, as now, through the world's evil ways,
And bless with fond care our last wearíful days."

An appeal for Chicago sufferers was made not in vain to an infant school in Pawtucket. A recess was given to the little girls so that they might go home and bring whatever wearing apparel they could spare. One little creature went home for her share, and finding her mother out, concluded to help herself, and accordingly packed up all the dresses, etc., of which she was possessed, save what she had on, and, with all the gravity possible, presented them to the committee, who, of course, packed them with the rest and sent them away. When the little girl's mother came to look for a change of clothes for the child after school, the discovery of what had been done took place, and the consternation in that family can be better imagined than described.

The "yen" is the unit of the new Japanese silver coinage, and corresponds with the American dollar in size and value. The "yen," "half yen," and "quarter yen" are all round coins, and are alike in every thing but size and value, the design on all being identical. The obverse has a sun and halo in the centre, with a wreath below and three flowers above. The reverse has the imperial dragon curiously coiled up in the centre, surrounded with Japanese characters. The milling is the same as that on the American coinage. Hitherto it has been found impossible to get any coin except the dollar of the republic of Mexico to pass current in China; but our Japanese advices state that the Chinese merchants in Japan are exporting the new Japanese coin to China by the cart-load as fast as it is issued from the mint, which would indicate that they expect it to go into general circulation in the Central Flowery Empire.

The recent cat show at Glasgow proved quite a success. Each animal was confined in a wire cage on tables in a large hall, which enabled visitors to view them on all sides. Although there was a large and excellent variety of felines, strange to say most of the cats, either suffering from homesickness or appalled by the novelty of their location, were remarkably depressed in spirits, having scarcely energy for a mew or a spit.

The museum at Cassel contains a curious collection illustrating trees from various countries. It presents the appearance of a library, in which the back of each volume is furnished by the bark of some particular tree; the sides are made of perfect wood, the top of young wood, and the bottom of old. When opened, the book is found to be a box, containing either wax models or actual specimens of the flower, fruit, and leaves of the tree.

A writer in the Williams Review opposes the admission of women into colleges because they can not bear hazing either of body or mind!

In Sweden swimming is such a universal accomplishment that if it is known that a young lady can not swim it is immediately concluded that she has some exceptional delicacy of constitution, just as we would suspect the same thing if told that a young lady could not walk. But in every Continental town there are excellent arrangements for open air—or open water—swimming, for ladies as well as gentlemen.

A singular and senseless instance of revenge is reported from Cairo, Egypt. The wife of a certain Antonio Marcelli, an Italian resident, lost her sight after careful treatment for opthalmia by a prominent oculist, Dr. Altier Garrulier. The husband, from a feeling of senseless revenge, waylaid the doctor and his secretary as they were going home one night, and threw nitric acid into their eyes, entirely destroying those organs.

In some remarks upon somnambulism, a correspondent of the Scientific American expresses his belief that the whole philosophy of sleep-walking has its foundation in habit, acquired by disturbance at some regular hour devoted to sleep. He says he has noticed that children who are allowed to go to sleep on the floor or lounge in the evening, and afterward, at some regular hour, are aroused (of course only partially awakened) and sent to bed, will in time acquire the habit of sleep-walking. Parents might well take note of this statement. In any case, it is injurious for children to be in the habit of going to sleep any where in the evening except in their beds. If they are sleepy, it is bed-time for them, no matter how early it may be.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. W. M. R.—A list of the cut paper patterns for sale at this office will be found in the advertising columns of the Bazar.

NELLIE.—Read all about wraps in Bazar No. 45, Vol. IV.

RIVERDALE.—A Watteau bow is three or four drooping loops and two long ends of faille ribbon about two and a half inches wide, placed just below the collar in the middle of the back of any wrap. Gothic points curve to a point instead of being sloped exactly on the bias.

HATTIE JONES.—Shorten the train of your silk, and use the pieces for making a short apron on the front widths, and extend the trimming from the apron down the sides to simulate a trained over-skirt.

A. E. T.—You will probably find a remedy for your friend's discolored complexion in the Bazar articles to "Ugly Girls." Read article on winter wraps in Bazar No. 45, Vol. IV. A cloth sacque with a cape is what you need.

MISS M. K.—Girls of twelve or fourteen years wear basques fastened in front, or plain waists fastened behind.

MANY READERS.—We have no agencies for the sale of patterns.

N. C.—Make a white tarlatan dress with demi-train trimmed to the knee with narrow pinked frills, each headed by a ruche. Make an over-skirt with short apron and long back. Half-high waist and antique sleeves.

MISS G. A. H.—Answers to your questions have been embodied in the New York Fashions, or with replies to others, and the Bazar has not space for reprints.

T. T.—Your letter was properly addressed.

MRS. M. S. C.—Make a sacque with talma for your largest girl, and use the Walking Coat pattern in Bazar No. 27, Vol. IV., for the youngest. Use the princesse and Gabrielle patterns for their dresses. Braid solid colors with black, or the shade of the dress.

MRS. ANNETTE W.—We do not make purchases for our readers. You should have addressed the firm having the salve to sell. Your money is subject to your order.

L. C.—Both your brown silk samples are stylish shades, but are too near alike to go together. Put a lighter wood brown with your corded silk.

H.—Your velvet cloak may be altered to a round talma with a Watteau fold, or else much trimmed in the back. The purple silk need not be altered.

MRS. W.—The Bazar gave a pattern in Supplement of child's flannel night-drawers.

MRS. M. R. B.—Get mazarine blue cloth for your boy's suit. Make kilt skirts and jackets for your boy of three years and a half.

G. H. B.—We have no cut paper pattern of a sacque without a seam in the back. The money inclosed awaits your order.

MRS. J. C. S.—We know nothing of your "Novice" letter.—Patterns have been sent you.

CAIRO.—Send for our Water-proof Cloak pattern and Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV., and you will have many hints about such cloaks. The colored English water-proofs are very durable and fashionable. Get gray, or else dark violet cashmere, for your Watteau wrapper.

MRS. S.—The mantle you want is simply a round cape with seams on the shoulders, or a talma without shoulder seams, and having a Watteau fold. The Bazar has given such patterns in Supplement numbers. Overlapping folds of silk, strapped at intervals with a similar fold or with gimp, will trim your polonaise stylishly.

M. M. H.—Your blue merino will look well made with a Marguerite polonaise, or else by the vest-basque suit pattern. Make a box-pleated waist of black cashmere or silk to wear with any of your dress skirts.

ELLA R.—The poem "Douglas, Douglas, tender and true" was written by Miss Mulock, now Mrs. Craik. She is the authoress of "Hannah."

MRS. H. B. H.—Put tapes in the back breadths of your long purple silk, and shorten it for the street.

STARLIGHT.—White is worn all winter by children of eight months. Make piqué Gabrielles and yoke slips of muslin. Plenty of warm under-clothing will keep him comfortable.

MRS. A. P. W.—We do not furnish stamps for braiding, or any braiding patterns except those given in the Bazar.

MRS. J. B.—Biarritz is pronounced as if spelled Be-ar'ritz.—Your sample did not reach us.

MRS. S.—The vest-basque suit pattern is what you want.

MUFF.—It is not necessary to have tassels on your muff.

DETROIT.—The Worth-basque house dress will give you a demi-train and upper skirt pattern for your tarlatan. Trim with ruches and ruffles.

L. Q. S.—The Marguerite polonaise is what you want for your London smoke poplin. Trim with bias velvet of the same shade put on like the design in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV., illustrating the Marguerite pattern sent you. Black lace over white muslin was worn in the summer on black silk street suits, but is not used this winter, and is only suitable for house dresses.

IGNORANCE.—I. H. S. on crosses stands for Jesus Hominum Salvator—Jesus the Saviour of men.

P. L. D. AND OTHERS.—For information about point lace braid read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 47, Vol. IV.

YOUNG MOTHER.—Babes are put in short clothes when five or six months old. The skirt should escape the floor, so that the child may not step on it in its effort to walk.

THE RIVALS.

See illustration on page 764.

THERE is no doubt that these swains are bitter rivals. The way that they glower at each other tells the whole story. The one in possession, comfortably seated by the cozy fireside, and of late sole master of the field, is angry at being dislodged from his monopoly, and puckers his face into a look which is meant to annihilate his antagonist. But signs indicate that the latter is the favored suitor, as may be seen from the welcoming look in the eyes of the damsel, who eagerly rises to offer him a chair, and even the friendly attitude of the household cat, who rubs amicably against his legs, and looks viciously at the first-comer.

THE EXPERIMENTAL BABY.

THE experimental baby! Poor little soul, what tortures it undergoes! Perhaps the mother can not nurse it herself, and so tries to bring it up "by hand," with generous intentions not to starve it, and to give it "good nourishing diet." She probably begins with nice thick farinaceous food, properly sweetened and made palatable enough; and when she makes her baby ill she flies to dill-water, or one of the many soothing sirups advertised. If she is a poor woman, and grossly ignorant, she gives her little one of eight months old fat bacon and apple dumpling, and tells you with pride that "it sits up with them, and takes the same as themselves." If she is what is called a lady, ten to one she clothed, and for no need, only for ignorance, not half protected from the weather, nor indeed half protected in any way. The child of the lady is swathed and loaded with garments till it can hardly walk under the load laid on it; and if the one runs the chance of bronchitis from sitting on damp door-steps with naked arms and undefended chest, the other runs that of hip disease, spinal disease, and general structural deformity from an overplus of clothing, which allows no organ free play. Poor food, and oftentimes unwholesome as well as poor — sometimes, oh, how often! not enough of it, bad as it is—checks the growth of the pauper's child, and lays the foundation of future disease. High living, wine, sweets, strong essence of meat, and the like, come to the same result with the child of the lady; and here, again, too much is as bad as too little, and extremes meet as elsewhere.

Now all this might be obviated by some sound physiological knowledge. What is wanted is knowledge, not means, and the substitution of physiological rules for experiment. It is something literally amazing, when we think of it, how we prepare, or rather do not prepare, for the nurture of our young. No man would undertake the breeding or the training of horses who was utterly ignorant of the subject; no one would undertake to paint a picture who had never learned to draw, and who did not know lake from burned umber. Yet we marry, and our women become mothers—which is the most important function in human life—with no more knowledge how to nurture or to train their young than a blind man has of colors, or a deaf one of harmonies. Babies come, and they are loved and delighted in. They are pretty little live dolls, plus a spark of intelligence; but they are experiments, and the first naturally the most so. Love does not necessarily include wisdom, and a mother's instinct does not reveal to her the unknown properties of food, or put her in possession of certain chemical facts. It is a favorite theory among women that it does, and that, given the child, the right knowledge will come, even without the usual blunders by which the experimental baby suffers. And more than this, the instinct of loving mothers is so large, and for the most part so unreasonable, that they resent all advice as interference, and hold the friendly matron who would put them on a better

A HOPELESS CASE.—[DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.]

A HOPELESS CASE.

SUCH is the verdict pronounced by the old cobbler on the dilapidated shoe, which is nothing but a ruin, but which the tattered pair before him have fondly hoped that he might make as good as new. And sadly the words fall on the ear of the barefoot boy, who sees his last protection from the cold paving-stones vanish, as well as of his sister, who is pensively devising means to replace the loss. The cobbler's interest is solely a professional one: no gleam of human feeling softens his rugged face as he turns over in his hands the ragged, soleless thing which was once a shoe, and at last gives it up as a hopeless case indeed, which all the skill of St. Crispin himself would fail to make whole.

errs on the side of carefulness. Her nursery is kept at a high temperature, the windows are not opened, and the gas is as an extra fire. In her anxiety that her experimental baby shall not take cold, she stints it of its oxygen; then wonders that it does not thrive, and probably suspects nurse of malpractices. If she had any simple instrument by which she could test the quality of the air breathed by those tender little lungs, she would want no other explanation, and the cause of her child's non-thriving would be apparent enough.

As the experimental baby grows out of its first helpless infancy, and begins to run about, the odd theories of which it is the suffering subject become more rampant—even more disastrous. The child of the poor woman is insufficiently

EXAMPLE FOR THE LADIES.

MRS. ELIZABETH A. MONAGHAN, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has used her Wheeler & Wilson Machine since 1861. During the war she stitched forty blouses a day of eight hours, averaging about $16 a week; since then she has stitched from thirty to thirty-six linen coats a day. Last year, in three months, she stitched 1274 linen coats, earning $186 46, besides doing her own housework and tending her baby. She would use no other machine.—[Com.]

NOTICE.—Buyers of Goods under the names of Wamsutta Prints, Checks, Lindseys, Cambrics, Ticks, and Silesias, are hereby informed that all such goods are not manufactured at the Wamsutta Mills. We limit our Name and the Wamsutta Ticket to our Bleached Shirtings and Sheetings. We have, in addition to our former Trade-Mark, adopted the following, which will in all cases appear with this notice.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., June 1st, 1867.

Thos. T. Bennett Jr. Agent Wamsutta Mills.

OFFICE OF WAMSUTTA MILLS, NEW BEDFORD, September 1st, 1871.

It has been the constant endeavor of our Company for more than twenty years to improve the quality of the goods of our manufacture; so that our fabrics are fully equal to any in the market. We have just completed a New Mill, supplied with machinery of the most approved kinds, and have also added to the machinery in the mills previously built all the latest improvements; so that we are now making our goods finer, heavier, and handsomer than ever before.

The goods are of the full width represented, and not on a basis of 35 inches for a yard.

All the Standard Goods bear our Ticket and the above Trade-Mark, and may be relied on for quality and quantity, and as of our manufacture.

The Agents for the sale of our goods to Jobbers and Wholesale Dealers are

MAKE A SPECIALTY OF THE

GORHAM M'F'G COMPANY'S

STERLING SILVER-WARE.

Especial attention is requested to the many new and elegant pieces manufactured expressly to our order the past year, and quite recently completed.

An unusually attractive assortment of novelties in fancy silver, cased for wedding gifts, of an inexpensive character.

The works of the Gorham Company are very extensive, enabling them to employ the most accomplished talent in designing, skill in producing, and the best labor-saving machinery and method of manufacture, thus reducing the cost and bringing these beautiful wares within the reach of almost every purchaser.

The standard of this Silver is that of British Sterling, 925-1000.

STEINWAY & SONS'

Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos

Were awarded the
FIRST GRAND GOLD MEDAL,
World's Fair, Paris, 1867, and London, 1862.

The Steinway Pianos are universally conceded to be

The Leading First-Class Piano

now before the public. These instruments are preferred to all others by the most celebrated pianists. They are used by all the principal concert troupes wherever attainable. They have a truly "world-wide" reputation, being largely exported to Europe and all parts of the civilized world, and they are sought to be imitated by nearly all American and European piano-makers.

Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory

is the most perfectly arranged and extensive establishment of its kind in the world. The published official revenue returns having revealed the fact that "the amount of their yearly sales exceed those of the twain largest piano-makers of New York combined."

STEINWAY & SONS call special attention to their

with double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, and Tubular Frame action, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other piano at present manufactured.

Every Piano Warranted for Five Years.

Prices as low as the exclusive use of the best materials and most thorough workmanship will permit. Old Pianos taken in exchange.

☞ Illustrated Catalogues, with Price-Lists, mailed free on application. ☜

WEBSTER'S PATENT

BUTTON-HOLE WORKERS.

Patented June 27, 1871.

One of the most important inventions of the age!
The most perfect Button-Hole Worker ever invented!

So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes, and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction.

The most liberal inducements offered to the trade.

Dry-Goods and Fancy-Goods Merchants find it an excellent selling article.

Local and traveling agents wanted every where.

Samples and terms, with full directions for use, sent prepaid on receipt of 50 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address

PRUDENCE AND FORESIGHT.

"Why do you put your Dolls by so carefully, Maggie?"
"I am keeping them for my Children."
"But suppose you don't have any Children?"
"Then they will do for my Grandchildren!"

SAGE OR PROFANE REMARK.

A humble but independent old widow in a rural district of Ayrshire, who, in addition to her cottage garden, had about a quarter of an acre of oats for bedding her cow and feeding her hens, was busily setting up her few stocks of grain after strong wind and heavy rain at the close of harvest.

"Well, Christie," said her landlord, in passing, "ye're setting up your corn."

"A'tweel am I," replied Christie, "and a draigled lot it is."

The widow was in a bad humor, so he changed the subject:

"How did you like your new minister, Christie?"

"Oh, very well indeed, Sir—very well indeed, as lang as he keepit hectoring awa' at Jonah for sleepin' when he should ha'e been praying; but afterhin nacthing wad please him but he maun begin praying for fine wather, though it was just first-rate at the time, as if the Lord didna ken how to mak wather better than he did! And what's the result? Here am I fechting among my pickle stooks as wat's a dish-clout aboon my knees!"

DRY READING.—Can you realize Mrs. Partington's bewilderment at hearing her grandson read from an article in the paper about Rome, "The ground is so parched that it is full of fishers!"

What is the worst kind of fare soldiers can live on?—Warfare.

DIDN'T QUITE CATCH IT.

OLD MANGELWUZEL (to amateur artist). "Mornin', Sir! You be rather late in the season, bain't 'ee?"

JACK SKETCHAM. "Yaas! Just catch the autumn tints, ye know."

OLD M. "Catch the—? Oh, ah! I s'pect you wull, too. They be a good deal about, and there's been a mortal lot carried off by the complaant!"

Art received rather an awkward criticism from a free-and-easy young man, who recently met a sculptor in a social circle, and addressed him thus, "Er—er—so you are the man—er—that makes—er—mud heads?"

ALMOST A SUFFICIENT REASON.

ANGELINA. "Sarah, have any of those mischievous children been playing with the piano while I have been out of town? Some of the keys won't sound at all."

SARAH. "Please, mum, I don't know nothink about it—leastways, Master Tom said there was somethink wrong with it, which he was sure there was a mouse in it, so he got Joe to hold up the cover while he put the dorg and cat in; but instead of catchin' the mouse, mum, they took to fightin', and did make such a funny noise in among them wires—so, maybe, mum, the mouse is in there still, mum."

WHAT NEXT?

OLD LADY. "Train just gone! How provoking! When does the Next start?"

PORTER. "At three-fifteen, Mum."

OLD LADY. "What a time to wait! When does the one Before that start?"

FACETIÆ.

A NEGRO woman was relating her experience to a gaping congregation of color, and among other things she said she had been in heaven. One of the ladies asked her, "Sister, did you see any blacks in heaven?"

"Oh, git out! You s'pose I go in de kitchen when I was dar?"

TO LAWYERS.—Can you make a blind man liable for his bill if it is payable at sight?

TO FARMERS.—How many clods make one wiseacre?

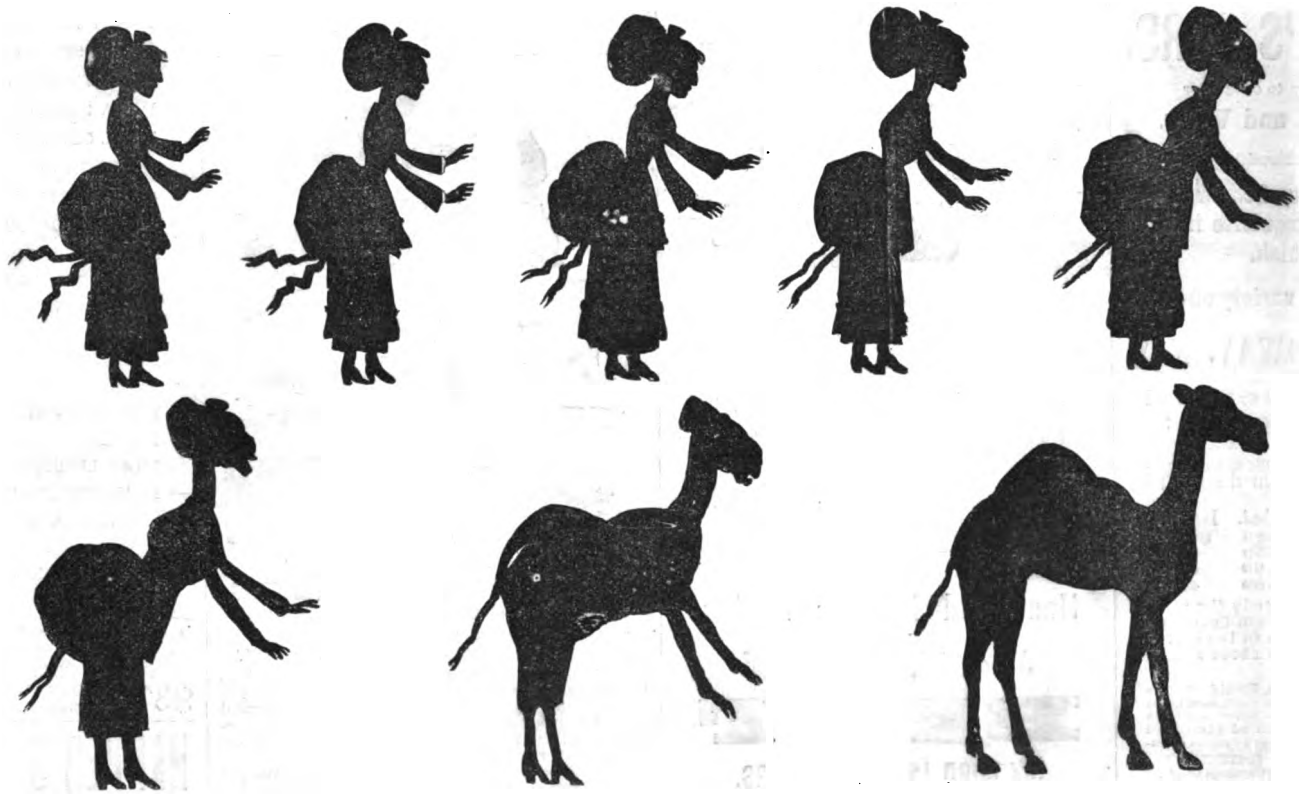
QUERY.—What is the difference between a drunkard's scruple and a dram?

HISTORICAL.—The reason why they beat the drum was because it called the harp a lyre.

You may find fashion in town, but you meet with more stiles in the country.

HOW TO MAKE A DULL FELLOW LIVELY.—Marry him to a girl named Annie, when, of course, he becomes Annie-mated.

TOO MUCH.—A magistrate at New Orleans recently punished a would-be suicide by making him pay his rescuer ten dollars. The disappointed culprit said he thought the sum excessive. It was, very probably, a good deal more than his intrinsic value.



WHAT THE GRECIAN BEND CAME TO.

PHASES OF GRIEF.—A French widower says that when a Frenchman loses his wife it is at first a duty to cry over his loss, and then it becomes a habit, and finally a pleasure.

BAD FORM—STALE.

THE FIRST COURT CHAMBLAR—King Arthur's round table.

TO ENGAGED PERSONS.—Better never than late.

TO MEND BAD SHERRY.—Have a sherry cobbler.

The singer who brought down the house has refused to rebuild it.

THE NET TO CATCH A WIFE WITH—A coronet.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 49.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Evening Dress, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS suit consists of an under dress of plain blue gros grain, and an over dress of blue and white chiné gros grain. Fig. 1 shows the under dress without the trimming, and Fig. 2 shows the same trimmed with ruffles and puffs of white organdy, and black velvet bows. Pleated Swiss muslin fichu, with ruffles of the same, which are edged on one side with lace half an inch wide. On the middle of the fichu in the back is a velvet bow with long ends; a bunch of flowers is fastened in the front of the corsage. To make the over dress, cut for the vest fronts of blue gros grain and white silk lining two pieces from Fig. 7, Supplement, allowing an inch and a quarter extra material on the front edge; then cut of chiné gros grain two pieces each from Figs. 8 and 9, and one piece from Fig. 10, having first joined on the pieces turned down in Supplement, Figs. 8-10, and allowed twelve inches extra material on the under edge of Figs. 9 and 10, in the direction of the arrow-heads. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 11, observing the contour of the under part. The sleeves, as well as the back and side forms, are lined with white silk, but on Figs. 9 and 10 the lining only extends from the upper edge to the bottom of the waist. After basting the material on the lining, sew up the darts in the fronts, fold the extra material on the front edge of the right front (Fig. 7) down on the under side, and work the button-holes; the extra material on the left front is left for a fly. Run the material and lining together, and sew on buttons. Both parts are corded on the bottom. Baste the vest fronts together according to the corresponding figures, and join them with the back and side forms. Arrange the over dress in pleats at the bottom of the waist, bringing × on ●, and drape it on the sides, bringing the ×'s of Fig. 8 on ● of Fig. 9. Cord the neck of the over dress, and trim it on the outer edge with a gathered ruffle, as shown by the illustration; the seam made by doing this is covered by velvet ribbon an inch and a quarter wide. On the sides, covering the layer of pleats, set bows of velvet ribbon three inches and a quarter wide. Sew up each sleeve from 22 to 23, set a ruffle on the bottom six inches and a half wide, and sloped toward the ends to a width of three inches and a quarter; in doing this gather the sleeve slightly, and cover the seam of the ruffle with velvet ribbon. Set on the bow as shown by the illustration, and sew the sleeves into the corded armholes according to the corresponding figures.

PARIS LADIES'-MAIDS.

THE class of servants which it is most difficult to keep in Paris is that of femmes de chambre. Men of all kinds usually hesitate a little before they give warning, for changing is a nuisance to them as well as to their masters; but Paris ladies'-maids shift about as easily as butterflies in a garden. And yet these very women, with all their capriciousness, do not go in for vanity or its satisfactions; they never wear their mistress's dresses, or set up for sham ladies, as do English women of their class. The spectacle which is so abundant at the West End of London on a Sunday afternoon, when the streets are filled with ridiculous creatures out for half a day, who imagine that they disguise their position in life by the flashy clothes they wear, but who simply make themselves thereby vulgar and contemptible, is unknown in Paris or in any part of France. The French maid is ceasing to wear caps in the street, and is adopting bonnets—that, unhappily, is true; but she dresses like what she is—respectably; and however we may deplore the gradual disappearance out-of-doors of the type of twenty years ago, we still find it inside the houses, where the maid's white apron and the bright cap with its starched strings continue to exist in all their merit. The French maid goes after love, not vanity; but even love does not render her less thrifty; and, like all other servants of her race, she lays by regularly: at two-and-twenty she has a small account at the savings-bank; and at thirty she possesses five railway debentures or a little rente; and if she does not marry, she has stored up, by the time she is an old woman, a few hundred pounds, and can go back to her village to end her days in peace. The men do just the same; and the economizing, prudent spirit of the nation is almost as evident in them as in the miserly peasants who live on nothing but black bread, but who have a long stocking full of gold hidden away under a tile in the floor.

There are scamps enough among them, but there are a great many excellent creatures too, and quantities of brave girls who stick to their religious duties, and get up in the early morning to go to mass, and who walk to their beds down those foul corridors with their eyes straight before them, and their ears resolutely closed, like little saints that no temptation can touch. Those are the people who counterbalance the cooks that rob you, and the valets who smash your glasses, and the coachmen who provide for their children by selling your oats.

☞ THE Publishers take pleasure in announcing that they have secured for the new Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR the most brilliant and fascinating array of literary and artistic attractions ever offered simultaneously to the American public. They comprise, for immediate issue, besides others that will be in due time announced in these columns, the following works:

"MIDDLEMARCH," a new serial story by GEORGE ELIOT, to commence in HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 16.

"MISS OR MRS.?" by WILKIE COLLINS, illustrated with striking full-page engravings from original drawings, to commence in HARPER'S BAZAR for December 23.

"BLADE-O'-GRASS," by B. L. FARJEON, author of "Joshua Marvel," with many beautiful illustrations, to commence December 16.

"THE GOLDEN LION OF GRANPERE," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, with illustrations, to commence in an early number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

They have also secured the plates and advance sheets of "LONDON: A PILGRIMAGE," by GUSTAVE DORÉ and BLANCHARD JERROLD, a new and magnificent series of illustrations from the pencil of the great French artist.

A new Novel by Miss THACKERAY, whose writings have won deserved popularity by their purity of tone, genial imagination, and fascinating style, will be commenced early in the year.

The great Spanish statesman, EMILIO CASTELAR, will furnish an important and interesting paper for an early number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE on "Republicanism in Europe."

These unprecedented attractions will require occasional literary Supplements to HARPER'S BAZAR and HARPER'S WEEKLY, which will be included in the regular issue, free of charge to subscribers.

We congratulate the readers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR on the rich and tempting intellectual repast provided for their enjoyment, and upon the rare privilege of sitting down to their monthly or weekly feast of fancy and flow of soul with such a select and excellent company of entertainers as GEORGE ELIOT, WILKIE COLLINS, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, CHARLES LEVER, Professor DE MILLE, B. L. FARJEON, GUSTAVE DORÉ, Miss MULOCK, Miss BRADDON, M. D. CONWAY, PORTE CRAYON, BAYARD TAYLOR, R. H. STODDARD, JOHN HAY, HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, EUGENE LAWRENCE, Dr. I. I. HAYES, THOMAS NAST, SOL EYTINGE, Jun., CHARLES PARSONS, W. L. SHEPPARD, JULES TAVERNIER, and many others of high rank in the world of letters and art. In securing this unprecedented array of splendid names, the Publishers are only carrying out their original design, and fulfilling what they conceive to be the legitimate duty of the conductors of widely circulated and popular periodicals. They intend that wherever their periodicals circulate they shall exert a healthful influence in every department of literature and art; and that in the future, as in the past, they shall be not only unsurpassed but unapproachable in the sphere of illustrated journalism.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR meet and satisfy the intellectual wants of the great mass of intelligent American readers; and in treating of literary, political, social, or domestic themes, offer an amount of wholesome instruction, recreation, and amusement which will be sought elsewhere in vain. They represent, therefore, for every American household the Graphic Literature of the World.

LUCK.

WE are all acquainted with people who seem born with a silver spoon in their mouths — emphatically lucky people, especially if there is any thing in the spoon. Their first early needs amply supplied, they glide into a roseate childhood; they have all the diseases incident to that period at the proper time; they escape from the hands of careless nurses; when they fall it is upon their feet. At school they are the favorites of pupils and teachers; they take the prizes, and spell to the head; they are never kept after hours, or disciplined with the ferule. They learn to swim without trouble, and skating is second nature. As they advance in years, they assume, gracefully, all the accomplishments and dignities of each period; they are never awkward; they always know what to do with their hands; they are never at a loss for something to say, nor under obligations to the weather; and when they speak the world applauds.

"Surely they carry a talisman under their tongues;" they have the "gift of gab," and know how to persuade. To be sure, they may not be the people who discover the great laws of nature, who write the immortal epics, or read the heavens like an open book; but undoubtedly they are very pleasant folks to meet in every-day life; the hours slip along for them on such a silken thread that they can afford to be amiable and magnanimous.

There are those, however, who are lucky in essentials, and those who are fortunate only in trifles—if there are such things. The latter invariably see the moon over the right shoulder, buy every thing at a bargain, find the persons they wish to find, and avoid the others, hold the bowers in euchre and the honors in whist, and keep their umbrellas till they wear out; time and tide seem to wait upon them; they catch the train at the last minute; though late at concert or lecture, they find the best seats: while the former seem acquainted with that tide in the affairs of men which leads on to fortune. When they travel, it is always the car just ahead or just behind which runs off an embankment; it is always the bank in which they do not take stock which breaks, the office in which they did not insure that fails. The gas which illumines the lucky man's house never transforms itself from an angel of light to a demon threatening the life of his family; the water-pipes, with proper regard for new paper and fresh carpets, take care to burst only when it is perfectly convenient, and at a season when the plumbers are not overworked. The lost will which he seeks comes to light; the woman he loves smiles upon him; the things he covets come to him as if by some natural attraction, as if there were some fitness between them. His letters never miscarry; and whoever knew the lucky man to be dunned? He seems to possess a charm for keeping creditors and other misfortunes at arms-length. Though flood or flame should destroy his home, and all his worldly goods resolve into their elements, friendship with its hundred hands will reach out to his succor across mountains or seas. He is the hero of to-day. His pictures bring fabulous prices, his books pass through innumerable editions, his poems are never parodied. He gets his case in court, and his seat in the Senate; and when he runs for office, it is as if the office ran for him. Wherever he goes he is the welcome visitor. People stand aside to let him pass on to fortune, take off their hats to him, lay down their lives for him: while ever beside him walks his pale brother, the Unlucky, whose shadow-like existence lends a lustre to the other's. This one has known the vicissitudes of fortune, the cold shoulder of the world; he has been beaten with many stripes; he has been in prison, in exile; his father disinherits him; his wife is a shrew; the publishers refuse his works; "the butcher, baker, and candlestick-maker" refuse him credit, and he is frequently out at elbow. Though he may be met in broadcloth and velvet in the best society, it is his daughter who elopes with her dancing-master, it is his sermon that is pronounced heretical, it is his pocket that gets picked in the crowd. He may be handsome or ugly, cultivated or illiterate; but neither his beauty nor his culture will avail him in this encounter with ill luck. While he is thinking what to say, the lucky man has said it; the lucky man gives ignorance and ugliness a varnish. People never laugh at Unlucky's jokes, while the other's commonplaces become classical. To be sure, we may say that such a constant run of luck is prosaic —smacks of the drawing-room and the easy-chair; does not admit of enough variety in the scenic effect; throws the picture of life into broad sunshine, unrelieved, like Chinese art, by shade or perspective; that it lacks the elements of romance or adventure. The lucky man never knew the sensation of hunger or of fear, perhaps; his emotions move in a confined orbit, certainly; but, for all this, how many an unlucky genius, whose every atom answers electrically to the world's touch, but would exchange his dinner of herbs, which imagination flavors, for the other's stalled ox?

Yes, we all sigh to be lucky; and perhaps we pay our homage to success from the consciousness that failure means want of will or vital force; perhaps we dimly recognize some subtile harmony existing between luck and the lucky—that it is only the natural outgrowth of their nature, the efflorescence of their lives!

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Good Intentions.

MY DEAR DICK,—Yesterday I was strolling home from collecting a semi-annual dividend, which, although not enormous, it is always very agreeable to collect, and perhaps gives me as much pleasure as the huge slices of profits that fall to the great nabobs in business. As I sauntered along, wondering, as usual, why people hurried so eagerly, I remembered the leisure life of the Old World, when I made the grand tour, and the lordly manner in which people who received smaller dividends than that in my pocket conducted themselves. When they arrived at a very shabby hotel, for instance, these complacent good people recorded themselves as rentiers—a superb title, such as Midas might have adopted, or Mehemet Ali, when Egypt was virtually his farm. They were not professional men, nor mechanics, nor bankers; indeed, they were not workers at all, still less producers. But they were receivers of rents. It might be but a dividend of ten francs, but they were capitalists. They put the lumps of sugar in their glasses of water with the air of Cleopatra dropping pearls into her wine.

It seemed to me that I had something of that feeling as I bore the little dividend homeward in my pocket. But then, remembering the amusement with which I used to contemplate the class of fellow-travelers who called themselves rentiers, I was uncomfortably conscious that it was quite as absurd for me to plume myself upon my lean revenue, and I fell to thinking of the chances of its increase. In the midst of my meditations Plutus drove by in his chariot with purple panels, and as I looked at my fellow-rentier I asked myself what good reason there was in the nature of things that he should be so much richer than his coachman—"or than you?" added my complacent consciousness to myself. I smiled a little, for I reflected with some soreness upon the occasion when I was just going to be rich and missed it. It was a very simple circumstance, and one that I have no doubt is familiar to the experience of many a man, for it was only this:

One day young Plutus came to my room and said that his father would gladly sell me a little stock, which he believed would prove to be very valuable. He told me all that he knew about it, and I thanked him, but begged to delay my answer. Then I went among my friends and advised with them, and the opinion of each one made me more uncertain. A note from Plutus begged me to decide. I replied that I was just about to do so. More visits to friends, and more perplexing counsel, left me in a pitiable condition. Another note from Plutus informed me that he must positively know my decision by noon of the next day. I scratched my head in despairing doubt. There was an evident risk in the venture, and I had but a small sum of money; but, on the other hand, there was the advice of a friend, and a sound judge of the situation. But, again, he was a banker, and might so readily be deceived by his own wishes. Besides, the habit of praising operations in which he was interested might warp his judgment even in dealing with a friend. But after a long wrestle with the reasons for accepting his offer and the objections to them, I decided that I would take the stock. It was nearly three o'clock when I hastened into his office, and Plutus said, quietly, that as I had not wished to buy, he had sold the stock to some one else. "But, my gracious, Plutus, I was just going to take it!" He smiled and said that he had mentioned noon as the hour by which he wished to hear from me, and that as I had not answered by that time, he was compelled to suppose that I did not wish it.

I could not fairly complain, and I confess that I walked away rather ruefully. And to-day that somebody else also drives a chariot with purple panels, and I suppose that the friends with whom I am walking when it passes are amazed by hearing me say that I was just going to have that chariot. And when we contemplate, in passing, that fine house upon Murray Hill, I say to them that I was just going to be rich. But just going to be is like poverty living in a hovel next to a palace. There seems to be but a wall between, yet the distance is immeasurable. Remembering these things, and meditating my little dividend, I saw a lady brush with her ample drapery a cooky from an old woman's stall. The cooky was round, and as it fell, rolled swiftly toward the gutter. A little street boy looked at it longingly, and while he stared, fascinated, the cake went over the curb and dropped into the dirty water. Such a look of pain came over the boy's face that I said, "Why didn't you pick it up, you foolish child?" And he replied, sniveling, with mingled hunger and disappointment, "I was jest a-going to!" I gave the boy the price of several cookies, for I recognized myself in him. Plutus will tell you that I was that very boy who was only "jest a-going to," and, therefore, lost his cooky.

It is the temperament of that boy which makes so much unhappiness among our fellow-travelers; and it is something to struggle with earnestly, as with a habit of stammering or personal untidiness. I sit in the cars and observe some unfortunate who only looks longingly at the cooky, and sees it plunge into the foul ditch. He is carried beyond his station, and says, piteously, that he was just going to ask the conductor. The boy comes with the papers, and when he is gone my traveler was just going to call him, and so must chase him through the train in vain. A lady enters, and no one rising, she passes along until the man in the most disagreeable seat offers it to her; and then my traveler is deeply troubled because he was just going to give her his corner.

I am very sure that Serus is of that opinion. If you know him, you know one of the most amiable and charming of men. He seems to you a model of courtesy and kindness; and as you watch him, no longer young, but full of sympathy and of sagacity, you wonder that he is a lonely bachelor, who should be the head of a happy household. Serus and I were school-mates, and I knew all his loves and friendships. Indeed, as we grew he became my confidential friend, and I knew the story of his heart. He loved Aurelia, whom all men admired, and I think that she was not averse to him. But the months passed, and suitors came and pressed, and still she said nay. Perhaps she wondered why Serus did not speak: perhaps she suspected at last that her own heart had deceived her. Yet, however it was, Leo came one day, manly, generous, winning; and at last he won. If there were any doubt in any mind about her feeling for him—if any body guessed that under his image upon her heart another was more deeply impressed—it was not said. The bride was beautiful, the groom was worthy; and if any heart heard a minor in the marriage bells, or caught a glimpse of rue in the nuptial wreath, it was its own secret.

I saw, indeed, the change in Serus. I saw the pallor in his cheek, and the restless manner; and one day, when we were all bidden to the wedding-feast, he came to my room, and the strong man was overwhelmed with passionate emotion and despair. "I have no right to live. A thousand times I have been on the verge of asking her. I was just going to ask her when I heard of her engagement." We stood together at the wedding. There was no cloud upon the bride's brow; there was no doubt in the groom's smile. The day was lovely; the flowers perfumed the sunshine. Every body smiled and said that such matches were made in heaven. But it was the saddest wedding that I remember. It was many years ago, and Serus and the wife of Leo are sincere friends to-day. Perhaps to both the past is a faded dream. Time, indeed, dulls every sorrow. It is a kindness, but not necessarily a gain. Serus is still the lovely youth of my boyhood grown old. He has never married. Nobody knows that he ever wished to marry. But in the spacious library in which his time is chiefly passed there is a legend printed in gold over the fire-place, so large and legible that every body is compelled to see it: "Hell is paved with good intentions." And if some visitor, curiously regarding it, asks him at length what it means, Serus answers, with a grave smile, "It is the text of the sermon of life."

I suppose you know the men who are just going to have fortunes fall to them, and whose careers are blank. If you will give me leave, I will take you to a club where you shall see those who were just going to do every thing that others have done. The other day a young gentleman took me aside and begged me to look over a manuscript book of poems, in which he said that I should see that he was just going to have made his fame by poetry in the new style when Tom and the rest came out with their books. Jason told me that he was just going to invent the electric telegraph when Morse happened to step in and reap the glory; and old Dennis has said to me confidentially that he was just going to write up the Arthur legends when Tennyson happened to publish the "Mort d'Arthur."

No, my dear Dick, it is not those who are just going to do, but those who do, that help the world forward. When my father was a boy he went to shoot deer in Maine with my uncle Bob. My father went as a kind of ideal hunter—that is to say that he had every kind of convenience, a shooting costume, and a perfect apparatus for his purpose. But Uncle Bob went, as we say, anyhow. Yet whenever at the critical moment my father had brought all his forces to bear upon the beautiful enemy—ping! went Uncle Bob's rifle, and the deer dropped. And every time my father turned and exclaimed, testily, "Hang it, Robert! I was just going to shoot him!" Perhaps he would have done so; but Uncle Bob did so. There is many a man who dies a drunkard just as he was going to abandon drinking. The famous horse was just going to live upon a straw a day when he died. My boy, it isn't enough to have good intentions. Half of the wrecks and failures that we see among men "meant well." But what avails to point your prow toward the Cape of Good Hope, if you have not force enough to prevent your ship from drifting to the frozen ocean?

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

EVENING DRESSES.

THE engraving on page 780, of which a cut paper pattern is given, presents the newest features in evening dresses. The low corsages sent over this season by Parisian modistes are simple round waists without points or postilion. It is said that Worth brought about this return to a fashion not long laid aside because of his admiration for the handsome sashes that accompany these waists. The top of the corsage is very low, and is prettily rounded in the shoulders, instead of being half high and square, in the style worn last winter. The trimming is a sort of bertha, or else Grecian folds. The sleeve is a mere epaulet or a tiny puff. Trained skirts with short over-skirts are not as fashionable at present as short under-skirts with trained over-skirts. The engraving represents an adjustable court train, that may be left flowing its graceful length, or shortened by tapes underneath to a trained or shorter bouffant over-skirt.

WEDDING DRESSES.

Creamy white faille is chosen for wedding dresses this season in preference to the more heavily repped Ottoman silk that is now imitated in cheap fabrics. Satin is no longer the first choice. The finest faille shown at the large dry-goods houses is marked $8 a yard; French modistes import a rarely beautiful faille that costs $10. From eighteen to twenty yards are required by the modistes for a wedding dress. Point lace is the favorite garniture, though a few are adopting the foreign fashion of simple tulle trimmings for the ceremony dress, reserving the lace flounces that in Europe are only worn by married ladies for the reception given a day or two afterward.

When the ceremony is performed in church the corsage is high, with antique sleeves straight to the elbow, with tulle frills below. The back of the waist has a postilion-basque, and is usually made with double side bodies and a seam down the middle; the front is now cut off straight, and has a belt of four faille folds, beginning at the seam under the arms. Two faille bows are in front. The neck is cut round, square, or heart-shaped, as the figure may require, but is always filled in with diagonal folds of soft tulle. Sometimes a Marie Antoinette collar, or a peasant fichu of faille (a sort of doubled kerchief), surrounds the neck. The skirt is a short front with trained over-skirt. This trained upper skirt, with folds hanging smoothly from the belt, is especially handsome for wedding dresses, producing a much finer effect beneath the bridal veil than the short upper skirts so easily disarranged. As the skirt of wedding dresses is all of one fabric, this train is usually sewed in with the side breadths, and is sometimes cut off square below the breadths of the short front. Brides no longer young, and widows marrying again, wear pale pearl-colored faille. For weddings at home low corsages are made in the manner described above for evening dresses. A lovely wedding dress made lately of pearl-colored faille had the trained breadths covered to the waist by fourteen gathered ruffles, arranged in pairs, overlapping. On each side was a broad revers held back by three immense bows. The front breadth had three broad flounces below, and a tiny apron above drawn back in many wrinkles. A wide faille sash, one end hanging on each side. High waist, with basque back, belted front, and point lace trimming.

Brides now wear orange blossoms alone, without the jasmine and spiræa once mingled with them. A set consists of a long spray for each side of the skirt, a double spray for the postilion-basque, a corsage bouquet to be placed high on the left side, instead of in front, and a crown wreath, with long sprays falling over the back hair.

A novelty at a French modiste's is a bridal veil of tulle, dotted with chenille like tiny flakes of snow. These imported veils are much shorter than those made here, measuring only two yards in the middle where they fall over the train. The corners are round, and the edge has a hem a finger deep of the plain tulle. Price $25. Another, at $15, has a broad border wrought in floss above the hem. The Psyche coiffure is arranged beneath bridal veils. This has a Greek twist at the back, with a braid of three tresses wound twice around it. The front hair is frizzed above the forehead, and surmounted by a crown braid, also plaited of three tresses.

The necklace for brides is of large pearls, strung like beads, and has from one to five strands. The bracelet is of the same simple fashion. The long ear-rings and the brooch are of rose pearls, secured in a knife-edge setting that shows as little gold as possible. The brooch is arranged to serve also as a pendant. A solitaire diamond or a pearl, in slight gold setting, is the usual engagement-ring. At entertainments given the newly married pair the bride leaves off her veil and orange blossoms, and wears in her hair an aigrette of white ostrich or heron's feathers. Such aigrettes, mounted in ornaments of pearl and diamonds, are shown at the jewelers', and marked $1500.

Shoes for brides are buttoned boots made of the fabric of the wedding dress. Her long-wristed gloves of white kid are without ornament, and are fastened by from three to six buttons.

BRIDE-MAIDS' DRESSES.

White tulle dresses over white silk are most often worn by bride-maids. They are adorned by flowers arranged in an informal manner, without any regular design. The very prettiest of the season had the tunic sprinkled all over with rose petals that looked as if scattered there by a shower. Over dresses of China crape heavily fringed are also worn by bride-maids. These are usually white, but at a large wedding, recently, they were of sky blue and pale rose-color, to suit both blonde and brunette attendants. The corsage of these dresses is usually made low.

BRIDEGROOM'S SUIT.

The bridegroom wears the full dress suit of black described in a late number of the Bazar. A white neck-tie is de rigueur. The groomsmen and ushers are also in full dress, though at a late very fashionable marriage they wore the English costume of blue frock-coat with lavender pantaloons.

WEDDING-CARDS.

Wednesday is the day, and 8 P.M. the hour, selected for fashionable weddings. Note sheets are not used for invitations this year; long, narrow cards, in the style of twenty years ago, are taking the place of square cards, and it is said that glazed cards are to supersede those of plain Bristol-board. Three or four cards appear in the envelope. For church weddings the largest card contains the invitation to the church in some simple formula, such as

CHURCH OF THE INCARNATION,
FIFTH AVENUE AND THIRTY-FIFTH STREET,
December 28, at 8 P.M.

The next largest card has the bride's name, and the smallest that of the groom. For very large weddings a fourth card is added, with "Admit to Church," engraved thereon. For home weddings the first card bears the invitation from the bride's parents, with number of residence and date of the wedding. A similar invitation accompanies cards for the church when a reception is held at the house. Monograms are now used only on envelopes for church weddings, and these invitations are furnished by the groom. Envelopes of cards to home weddings are embellished with the silver initial of the bride's parents, and are supplied by her father.

DRESSES OF THE TROUSSEAU.

Gray is no longer in favor for the traveling and street attire of brides, as it publishes their bridehood as plainly as orange flowers do. The stylish olive, either brown or green, or the dark nut brown cashmeres are chosen as polonaises over silk skirts for traveling, or else a camel's-hair over-skirt and double cape are worn over a silk skirt, or perhaps a cloth suit trimmed with thick passementerie cords. The hat is a toque of velvet of the same color or black. The visiting and church suit is partly of faille, partly of velvet, of plum-color, mignonette, London smoke, or any of the stylish dark shades, and quite often black. The bonnet is of corresponding color. A white bonnet is now rarely seen. Evening bonnets are of light rose, blue, or flesh-colored velvet. A black silk suit and a demi-trained dress of black silk are still essential to a complete and stylish trousseau, and are decidedly the most useful dresses when the number is limited. The handsomest morning dresses are of ashes-of-roses, or else violet cashmere, with Watteau fold behind, and a wide revers on each side of the front embroidered or braided with the same shade. A Gabrielle of gray cashmere is braided all over with soutache of the same color. A cord and tassel are now worn instead of a belt with wrappers. A dressing-gown of pressed flannel in stripes or broken plaid is added to all trousseaux.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DILDEN; and VIRFOLET, and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and A. L. CARILLO.

PERSONAL.

MR. FARJEON, the author of "Joshua Marvel," recently published by the HARPERS, and "Blade-o'-Grass," is pronounced by Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY to be one of the most promising of all the younger novelists of the day. Mr. M'CARTHY divides the British novelists of the day into four classes. First class: George Eliot—she alone, and nobody else. Second class: CHARLES READE, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, WILKIE COLLINS, Miss BRADDON, Miss MULOCK, Mrs. OLIPHANT, Mrs. HENRY WOOD, and one or two others. Third: Rising novelists, not widely known, but who have thus far been successful. Among these is Mr. FARJEON. The fourth class is composed of that immense rank who are not known, and of whom nothing can be expected—ladies of fashion whose husbands pay for the printing of books, etc., etc.

—Queen VICTORIA'S personal fortune is said to be about $35,000,000, or only a little more than double the available assets of Mr. TWEED.

—GAMBETTA is the hero of this story: At Le Mans, during the war, he and six others held a council of war, at which it was decided to arrest and shoot the Prince de Joinville, then a volunteer doing good service against the invader. Among the six present were the notorious RANC and SPALLER.

—Miss BRADDON, who has won so much distinction as a novelist, is only thirty-four, and was born in London. Her father was Mr. HENRY BRADDON, a lawyer of some talent, who wrote numerous articles for the sporting magazines of twenty years ago. Miss BRADDON commenced literary work at an early age, by contributing sentimental poetry, political squibs, etc., to the periodicals of the day. She is a lady of indomitable energy.

—GARIBALDI, or GARRY BALDY, or GARRET BALDWIN, which latter is probably his real, full name, is preparing his memoirs, to be published after his death. It will include something about his residence in New York, and his friendship with Mr. JOHN ANDERSON, whose tobacco has for so many years been a solace to chewers of the weed.

—It is understood to be in the programme of the royal Russian to visit Mrs. COLT, at Hartford. When THOMAS H. SEYMOUR was United States minister at St. Petersburg, Colonel SAMUEL COLT had a pistol manufactory there, and lived at a fine old rate, as he could afford to do. Since then he has made much pistol for the emperor. Hence, etc.

—The appointment of GEORGE H. BOKER as minister to Turkey is one of the most popular the President has made. The press of all parties approve it. He is one of the most intellectual and cultivated men of the country, and has an ample private fortune to help him on in the hospitalities of the mission.

—Mr. JAMES THOMPSON writes to the editor of the Randolph (Illinois) Plaindealer that he laid off the first lots ever laid off in Chicago, in 1828. There was then only one hotel or boarding-house in the place. There was an election held, at the time Mr. THOMPSON was there, for captain of a militia company, and the election was warmly contested by two prominent men of the place. All the legal voters attended and voted. When counted, there were twenty-seven in all.

—The Memphis Appeal thinks that if Mr. THOMAS A. SCOTT is to become President of the United States, and president of all the railroads at the same time, we might as well throw up the sponge at once.

—MOMOLA MORTARA, father of the young Jew whose conversion to the Church of Rome attracted so much attention a few years since, was recently tried in Florence for the murder of his servant-girl in April last, by throwing her out of the window.

—It is said that Queen VICTORIA is a spiritualist. She has a firm conviction that Prince ALBERT is always present with her, and that she can hold communion with him. Her private rooms are arranged as they were when he was alive. His chair is placed opposite to her own in the library, and the books which he delighted to read to her are arranged lovingly in order on the table.

—The Rev. Dr. WILLIAM ADAMS, one of the ablest divines of the country, has for thirty-seven years been settled over the same people. He commenced his ministry in the Broome Street church, where he was ordained. The Rev. Dr. CHAPIN was born in Washington County in this State, and has been preaching in this city since 1848.

—The Rev. MARC ANTONY DE WOLFE HOWE, of Philadelphia, has been chosen Bishop of the new diocese of Central Pennsylvania. He was elected Missionary Bishop of Nevada in 1865, but declined. It is not every day that a MARC ANTONY is elected a bishop, and HOWE it came to be done now is not known to the general world of heretics outside the P. E. C. in the U. S.

—Prince NICHOLAS GALITZIN has given his concert of Russian music in New York, and although the audience did not particularly rave about it, it is said they rather enjoyed it. Of course many went to see as well as hear the musical prince. His history purports to be about this: His father, who always held a high position near the ALEXANDROVITCH family, was very fond of music, and among his most intimate friends was the great composer, BEETHOVEN. The young man became in this manner infused with a genuine passion for music, and he was not long in determining to pursue the profession of an artist. When this became known among the aristocracy they ridiculed and insulted him without stint. This was as nothing, however, to the violent opposition which arose when GALITZIN broached the idea of freeing his serfs some twenty years ago. This unheard-of eccentricity was treated as something little short of madness, and the emperor, as soon as the emancipation was consummated, took away the artist's estates, and refused to allow him to enjoy his own property unless he would give up his peculiar whims. Nothing daunted, GALITZIN went to London, and by the exercise of his musical talent supported his wife and children for two years and a half. In the course of time public opinion in Russia changed, and his estates were restored, so that now he is once more independent. Nevertheless, he adheres to his old preferences, and gives concerts at St. Petersburg frequently. He is at present traveling at his ease in this country.

—M. C. KERR, of Indiana, is the only man in Congress or the country who writes "M. C." at both ends of his name.

—M. CAPOUL is one of the best, as well as one of the handsomest, tenors that Mr. STRAKOSCH has yet introduced to the public. He was an especial favorite of AUBER'S, and is regarded by managers as not only thoroughly capable, but perfectly reliable. He has a passion for horses, and has some of the finest in Paris. During the war CAPOUL fought bravely as a volunteer in the Army of the Loire.

—Miss SARAH E. HORNER, of Georgetown, Massachusetts, has been elected to a professorship in the University of Florida, at Tallahassee. Miss H. has for twenty years been a teacher in the public school at Georgetown, and recently has acted as a member of the School Committee.

—President GRANT has evinced his respect for the man of color by appointing HENRY WHITLAW steward of the White House, and being his bondsman for $50,000.

—Count ANDRASSY, the new Chancellor of Austria, was a Hungarian exile, and in 1849 was sentenced to death for participation in the Hungarian revolution. He escaped to Turkey, and went thence to England, where he subsisted by giving lessons in French, and wrote pamphlets denouncing the Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH as one of the most blood-thirsty and cruel rulers of modern times. To-day he is the favorite and confidential adviser of the monarch whom he once so roundly abused, and the successor of the most brilliant statesman that has conducted the foreign affairs of Austria since Prince METTERNICH surrendered the reins of government. The emperor finally permitted Count ANDRASSY to return to his native country, and afterward restored his estates. He began at once to take an active part in politics, and was elected to the Hungarian Diet, where his eloquence, political experience, and parliamentary skill secured him a distinguished position.

—Mr. GLADSTONE has fame as a pedestrian. When returning from his recent official residence at Balmoral, he walked from the castle to Clova—twenty-six miles—resting at night at the village inn, and proceeding to Kirriemuir next day on foot.

—The wealthiest member of the diplomatic corps at Washington is Colonel FREYRE, the Peruvian minister. He owns a pleasant country-seat in New Jersey.

—A large portion of the library of the late WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT has been bought by Professor LONGFELLOW and JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

—It is spoken of in the higher Constantinopolitan circles as something almost incredible, that the late Grand Vizier, AALI PACHA, died insolvent. He owed $500,000. His assets were fifty per cent. short.

—Mrs. LYDIA SEATON, a lady of seventy years of age, is chaplain of the Kansas State-prison.

—Mr. GRANT, in his interesting book on the London press, tells a very good story of the origin of the custom of charging for the insertion of marriage announcements. At first these were published freely, as they still are by many provincial papers. But in the early days of the Times it was the custom in announcing a marriage to state the amount of the bride's dowry—£20,000 or £30,000, whatever it might happen to be—and, in looking through the ladies' column one morning at breakfast, Mr. WALTER threw out the suggestion that if a man married all that money he might certainly pay a trifling per centage upon it to the printer for acquainting the world with the fact. "These marriage fees would form a nice little pocket money for me, my dear," added Mrs. WALTER, and, as a joke, her husband agreed to try the experiment. The charge at first was but a trifle, and the annual amount probably not much; but Mrs. WALTER, at her death, passed this prescriptive right of hers to her daughter, and when, a few years ago, the right was repurchased by the present proprietor, it was assessed at £4000 or £5000 a year.

—The Spanish estates of the Empress EUGÉNIE are said to have the following origin: In consequence of the 1823 Bourbon expedition, Spain owed France some millions, which, being capitalized, would, in 1854, have amounted to £3,200,000. A convention between the two governments, however, reduced this sum to £1,000,000, which was gifted to the empress, and conveyed to her in the shape of vast tracts of land, which she has stocked with the best vines of France.

—The great Hindoo blue-stocking, RUNGAMBA GARU, has recently arrived in London, and will constitute one of the chief lions or lionesses of the season. Her lecture on "Human Being" has caused great sensation in India. The Hindoo gentlemen pronounce her great. She lectures with her face veiled to her mouth, and says men are superior to women.

—Professor PARKE, of Amherst, lately told this instance of the power of EDWARD EVERETT in gesture: "At a public lecture," said the professor, "EVERETT began his speech thus: 'Before you seek to grasp the great secrets of nature, you must pause to examine the harmony which exists in her minutest details. For instance, think of the marvels contained in a drop of water!' Thereupon a tremendous burst of applause. You listen to this phrase without the smallest emotion. But, as EVERETT spoke, he dipped his finger in the tumbler which stood beside him, and drew it forth, suffering the drop of water to trickle back again. It was the appropriate gesture which caused the surprise and admiration—it was so careless, so spontaneous. Now, what think you, boys? I have seen a letter in EVERETT'S hand, in which he asks a friend whether such a gesture would be admissible in point of taste, and whether he thinks he may adopt it."

Knitted and Crochet Bib, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS bib is worked with coarse white tatting cotton, No. 40. The foundation is knitted in an open-work design; the border on the outer edge is crocheted and underlaid with narrow blue silk ribbon. Fringe strands of white cotton are tied to the under edge of the bib. Begin the foundation of the bib at the under edge with a foundation of 101 st. (stitch), and, going backward and forward on this, knit, first, * two rounds, which must appear all purled on one (the right) side of the bib, three rounds which appear all knit plain on the right side, then again two rounds which appear all purled on the right side: in the 3d as well as the 6th of these first seven rounds, however, work off together the three middle st. of the work in each. 8th round.—Alternately 2 st. knit together, t. t. o. (thread thrown over). These 8 rounds form one pattern figure.—Repeat 11 times more from *, but in the first round of every new pattern figure knit off the thread thrown over as a st. The narrowing is done regularly in the course of the work; besides this, in order to form the sloped outer edge of the bib, widen 1 st. each at the beginning and end of the 1st round of the 9th pattern figure. This widening is repeated in every third following round. After the last round of the 12th pattern figure, repeat the first seven rounds, but in working the last of these seven rounds cast off the middle 17 st. of the knitting for the slope of the neck. With the st. on each side now knit 19 rounds as before, without interrupting the design and the widening; but on the side which comes on the slope of the neck cast off several st. in every second following round of these 19 rounds, first casting off 5 st., then 4 st., then three times 2 st. each, and, finally, always 1 st. only. Now knit 7 rounds more like those at the beginning of the bib, in doing which work the shoulders in a point by narrowing on both sides. The shoulder tabs are knit going backward and forward also. For each tab make a foundation of 20 st., and with this knit 95 rounds, alternately 3 rounds which appear all knit plain on one (the right) side, 2 rounds which appear all purled on the right side; but in the first 36 rounds narrow 1 st. each at the beginning and end of every 6th round. Cast off the st. of the last round, furnish the tab with a button, and sew it on the crosswise side of the shoulder. For the trimming of the bib make a foundation with the tatting cotton and a crochet needle of suitable size; this foundation must correspond with the outer edge of the bib (excepting the neck). On this foundation crochet: 1st round.—Alternately 3 ch. (chain stitch), with these pass over 3 st. of the foundation, 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the next st. In order to form the corners in the trimming strip, crochet at the relative point, observing the illustration, Fig. 2, which gives a full-sized section of the bib, 2 stc. separated each only by 7 foundation stitches. On this round crochet a scalloped round with fine tatting cotton, No. 60, as follows: * 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next stc., 6 dc. (double crochet) on the middle of the following 3 ch.; repeat from *. Work a similar round also on the under still free veins of the foundation st., in doing which it must be observed that the scallops of both rounds lie opposite each other. On this round follows, first, one round of alternately 1 dc., 3 ch.; in working the dc. pass the needle through the free horizontal back vein of the foundation st. on which the stc. has already been worked; then crochet one scalloped round like that previously worked. All rounds worked with the fine cotton must be crocheted very loosely. For the trimming on the neck of the bib work two rounds of scallops turned toward each other. Crochet these rounds on the veins at both sides of a ch. foundation of the requisite length. The trimming strips are sewed on the bib, in doing which underlay the open-work strips as shown by Fig. 2. Previous to this, however, tie fringe strands, consisting of two threads of tatting cotton five inches long each, into the free veins of the foundation st. at the under edge of the bib. Furnish the bib on the sides, as shown by the illustration, with button-hole loops, which serve to button on the shoulder tabs.

CROCHET WAIST FOR CHILD FROM 1 TO 2 YEARS OLD.

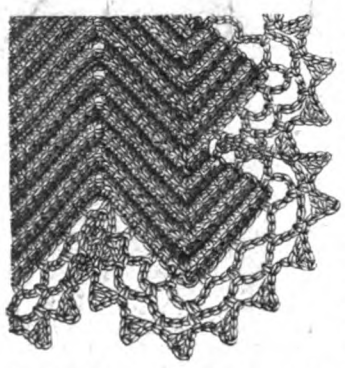

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF CROCHET BIB. FULL SIZE.

Crochet Waist for Child from 1 to 2 Years old.

THIS waist is crocheted on a foundation of white dress cord with medium-sized knitting cotton (Estremadura, No. 4½) in rounds of sc. (single crochet), going backward and forward. The waist is trimmed on the upper and under edges and on the sleeves with a row of crocheted lace, through which red ribbon is drawn as shown by the illustration. Begin the waist at the under edge with a foundation of 270 st. (stitch). This foundation is 21 inches long in the original. Crochet 40 rounds in the manner above referred to on the foundation, in doing which always pass the needle through the back vein of the st.; work 1 ch. (chain stitch) at the end of every round, and then turn the work. In the first 9 rounds gores are formed by narrowing; to do this pass over the 100th and 111th, the 160th and 171st st. in the 2d round. This narrowing is repeated in every second following round, but the first and last (the outer) narrowing of every round must be brought 1 st. nearer to the inside each. Besides this, widen in the 38th round; to do this work 2 sc. each on the 103d and 147th st. This widening is repeated in the second round of each of the next four ribs. In the 41st round crochet 14 rounds for the back parts on the first 58 and last 58 st. (the middle st. of the crocheted part are for the present left unnoticed); but in working these 14 rounds take no notice of the last 2 st. in every second following round on the inner side (armhole). Now crochet on the st. previously left unnoticed 11 rounds for the front of the waist, in doing this narrow 15 st. altogether on each side, 5 st. each in the first two rounds, 3 st. each in the 3d and 4th rounds, then always 2 st. each. For each sleeve, beginning on the upper edge (the shoulder), make a foundation of 50 st., and on this crochet five rounds without changing the number of stitches; at the end of the 5th round crochet 7 ch., turn the stitch, which forms a point design. Begin the bib on the under edge with a foundation of 162 st. (stitch), and, passing over the last of these, crochet the 1st round.—* 1 sc. (single crochet) each on the next 10 foundation st., pass over the following 2 foundation st. and again work 1 sc. each on the next 10 foundation st., but on the following st. work 3 sc.; repeat six times more from *. Leave off the widening at the end of the round, crochet 1 ch. (chain stitch) there, and turn the work. 2d round.—(From now on always pass the needle through the back vein of each sc.) 1 sc. each on the first 9 sc. of the preceding round, * pass over the next 2 st., 1 sc. each on the following 10 st., 3 sc. on the next st., 10 sc. on the following 10 st., and repeat five times more from *. Finally, 9 sc. on the last 9 st. of the preceding round, 1 ch., and turn the work. 3d–10th rounds.—Like the 2d round, but the st. of both outer points are lessened by 1 st. each in every round. In order to form a new point at the end of the 10th round, crochet 11 ch. and turn the work. 11th round.—Pass over the last of the 11 ch., work 1 sc. on each of the 10 foundation st., pass over the next 2 st. of the preceding round, and continue to work as before. At the end of the 11th round begin a new point also, to suit the other side edge. Illustration, Fig. 2, shows a full-sized section of the bib. In this manner work altogether 80 rounds, then pay no attention to the middle four points of the work (these points afterward come on the slope of the neck), and on the st. at each side crochet 21 rounds more, in doing which form points, corresponding to the outer edge, also on the inner side (the neck). On the outer edge of the bib crochet a row of lace three rounds wide, observing the illustration. The first two rounds consist of transposed ch. scallops, while in the third round points are formed; each point consists of 4 ch., pass over the last of these, and on the next 3 ch. work 1 sl. (slip stitch), 1 sc., 1 double crochet; after each point work 1 sc. on a ch. scallop of the preceding round. The points of the middle four points on the upper edge of the bib are turned down, as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1, and fastened on the foundation with a few stitches. Tie the bib with ribbon strings and loops.

work, pass over the last of the 7 ch., and on each of the 6 ch., as well as on the st. of the preceding round, work 1 sc. The 6th round is lengthened at the end in a similar manner by 6 st., the 7th and 8th rounds by 2 st. each, the 9th and 10th by 4 st. each, the 11th and 12th by 6 st. each, and the 13th and 14th rounds by 5 st. each. Finally, crochet one more round of sc., in doing which close the sleeve in a ring. Sew the sleeves into the armholes; it must be observed, however, that the edge stitches of the first five rounds, which end in a straight line, come on the upper edge of the front and back. Work one round of sc. on the under edge and on the back edges of the waist on a foundation of cord. On the upper edge of the waist work alternately 1 stc. (short treble crochet), 1 picot, the latter consists of 5 ch., 1 sc. on the first of the 5 ch.; with the picot always pass over 2 st. of the last round, and besides this, in working this round, always pass the needle through the back vein of a st. Now work the lace turned downward on the upper edge of the waist on the same round of single crochet. To work the lace begin at the upper corner of the right half of the back, always passing the needle through the front veins of the st., so that the right side of the lace is turned outward. 1st round of lace.—* 2 sc. separated by 4 ch. on the next st., on which 1 stc. has already been crocheted, 7 ch., with these pass over 5 st. Repeat from . 2d round.—Like the 1st round, but every 2 sc. separated by 4 ch. should be worked on the middle st. of the 7 ch. 3d round.— 2 sc. separated by 4 ch. on the middle of the next 7 ch., 7 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 7 ch., 2 ch., and repeat from . On the under edge of the waist crochet two rounds like the 2d and 3d rounds of the lace. Edge the bottom of the sleeves with a row of lace crocheted in the following two rounds: 1st round.— 2 sc. separated by 4 ch. on the next st., 4 ch., pass over 2 st., 1 stc. on the next st., 4 ch., pass over 2 st., and repeat from *. 2d round.—2 sc. separated by 4 ch. on the stc., 7 ch., 1 sc. on the third of the 7 ch., 2 ch., and repeat from *. Furnish the back with buttons and button-loops for closing, and run colored ribbon through the waist, as shown by the illustration.

on the 3 gold of the preceding round, 2 red, 3 gold, 2 black. The next six rounds, in which the corners of the star become pointed, are worked as plainly shown by the illustration; in doing this the black st. between the corners are increased as much as may be required. Then follow two more rounds of sc. all of black silk, with regular widening also. The second of these two rounds must count 192 st. Henceforth work from the design in the Supplement and the description of symbols belonging thereto, crocheting the 26th–34th rounds without widening; in the 35th and 36th rounds widen so many st. that the 36th round counts 208 st. For the upper end of the pouch first crochet one round of open-work dc. (double crochet) with black silk, then with gold thread work a row of lace of three rounds, as follows: 1st round of lace.—* 6 sc. on the next 6 st. of the preceding round, 3 ch., pass over 4 st., 3 dc. on the following st., 3 ch., pass over 4 st. 2d round.—* 4 sc. on the middle 4 of the 6 sc. of the preceding round, 2 ch., 3 dc. on the last of the 3 ch., 1 ch., 3 dc. on the first of the next 3 ch., 2 ch. 3d round.—* 2 sc. on the middle 2 of the 4 sc., 2 ch., 3 dc. on the second of the next two ch., 2 ch., 3 dc. on the next ch., 2 ch., 3 dc. on the next ch., 2 ch. Through the open-work double crochet round on the upper edge of the pouch draw two cords crocheted in chain stitches with black silk, the ends of which are trimmed with two tassels of silk in different colors. Each of the tassels is furnished with a head, for which work two rounds of sc. with gold thread, two rounds of sc. with black silk, one round of sc. with gold thread, and one scalloped round with gold thread, always going forward. In the first three of these six rounds widen in the requisite manner. Set a similar tassel on the bottom of the pouch. Trim the pouch also on both sides with a grelot fastened on two short ch. cords; on each of these grelots nine rounds of sc. with gold thread and black silk have been crocheted. Finally, line the pouch with kid.

See illustration on page 772.

THIS thick white flannel cover is ornamented in point Russe embroidery and button-hole stitch scallops of pink split zephyr worsted, and lined with white shirting. Cut, first, of flannel and lining for the bottom a circular piece to suit the size of the hot-water bottle (this piece is fourteen inches in diameter in the original), and for the tabs cut eight parts, each in one piece, from Fig. 18, Supplement. Then transfer the design given on Fig. 18 to the pieces of outer material, and on these work the embroidery. Baste each of the eight parts on the lining and work the button-hole stitch scallops with double split zephyr worsted, or with zephyr worsted; cut away the material and lining on the outer edge of the parts, along the edges, and backstitch the bottom to the eight tabs; in doing which care must be taken that they overlap each other as shown by the illustration. The edges of the seams are covered with a strip of shirting half an inch wide. To make the cover fit the hot-water bottle closely, the tabs may be gathered slightly each on the outer edge with a piece of fine cord. This is best done by drawing the cord through the button-hole stitches on the under side at the hollow of the scallops. Finally, fasten a loop of white cord to the upper point of each tab on the inside, and sew a button on one of the tabs, which at the same time covers the stitches made by sewing on the loop. To close the cover always draw one loop through the next following loop, beginning with the loop under the button; the last loop is drawn over the button.

Crochet Tobacco Pouch.

See illustrations on page 772.

THIS pouch is designed for Turkish tobacco. It is crocheted with saddler's silk in different colors and with gold thread, and is trimmed with grelots and tassels of gold and silk, and lined with kid. If a larger size is desired, it may be worked with split zephyr worsted in different colors. Begin the pouch at the middle of the bottom, making a foundation of 5 ch. (chain stitch) with black silk; close the foundation in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and work with black silk six rounds of sc. (single crochet), always working 2 sc. on each foundation st. in the 1st round, and in each of the following five rounds widen so many st. that the 6th round counts 50 st. 7th round (without widening).—* 2 sc. with black silk, 3 sc. with gold thread; repeat 9 times from *. In this, as in the following rounds, always work off the last st. of one color with the thread of the other color, in changing two colors. We shall make no further reference to repeating from , which occurs in every round. 8th round.— 2 st. black on the 2 black st. of the preceding round, 2 st. gold, 1 red, and 2 gold on the 3 st. gold of the preceding round, working each 2 gold on the first and last of the 3 st. gold of the preceding round. Now follow six rounds in the same alternation of colors; in these rounds every 2 st. black and 2 st. gold must come on each other, and the red st. lying between these must always be increased by 1 st. in every second round. 15th round.—* 2 st. black and 2 gold on the similar st. of the preceding round, 3 red, 1 gold, 3 red on the 7 red st. of the preceding round; the 1 gold must come on the middle of these 7 red st., then 2 gold. 16th round.—* 2 black on the 2 black and 2 gold on the 1 gold of the preceding round, 3 red, 3 gold, 3 red on the next 9 st. of the preceding round, 2 gold on the last of the 2 gold. 17th round.—* 2 black on the 2 black of the preceding round, 3 gold, 2 red, 3 gold, the latter

THIS useful toilette adjunct consists of a round card-board box, ornamented with a cover of pink satin; the latter is furnished with a square piece of embroidery of white cloth. Choose a box (the original is three inches in diameter) with a cover that extends almost to the bottom. Cut of pink satin and net lining a square piece six inches and three-quarters in height and width, round off the four corners slightly, and cover the folded edges of the material by sewing on a row of black lace three-quarters of an inch wide. Sew a piece of white silk cord all around, one-third of an inch from the outer edge; for this a cord stitch row worked with white silk may be substituted. Transfer the design, a quarter section of which is given by Fig. 54, Supplement, to a piece of white cloth four inches square, and work the embroidery in satin stitch, the berries with pink silk floss, and the leaflets and stems with mixed green saddler's silk. A small bead ornaments the point of each berry. This part is now pinked on the outer edge, as shown by the illustration, and trimmed on the corners with silk tassels. On the cover of the box arrange the satin as well as the embroidered part, and fasten the four corners of the latter with several stitches that must show as little as possible, passing the needle through the satin and through the card-board; to the middle of the top sew a brass ring, crocheted with silk, for a handle.

OUTSIDE.

JUST a gleam thro' the darkness;
The lift of two eyes from a book;
A glance—but some glances are heaven:
To such eyes 'tis given
To make Paradise in a look.

Just a face in the lamp-light;
A hand, and some glittering hair:
But hearts have been broken, it's said,
And white steel stained red
For faces less faultlessly fair.

Just a girl in her beauty,
Her glory of freshness and youth:
But what has earth better to sigh for—
To live for—to die for—
Than innocence, beauty, and youth?

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXII.

ONLY A PORTRAIT-PAINTER.

WHILE Clarissa was pondering on that perplexing question, how she was to see her brother frequently without Mr. Granger's knowledge, fortune had favored her in a manner she had never anticipated. After what Mr. Fairfax had said to her about Austin Lovel's "set," the last thing she expected was to meet her brother in society—that fast Bohemian world in which she supposed him to exist seemed utterly remote from the faultless circle of Daniel Granger's acquaintance. It happened, however, that one of the dearest friends to whom Lady Laura Armstrong had introduced her sweet Clarissa was a lady of the Leo-Hunter genus—a certain Madame Caballero, née Bondichori, a little elderly Frenchwoman, with sparkling black eyes and inexhaustible vivacity; the widow of a Portuguese wine-merchant; a lady whose fortune enabled her to occupy a first floor in one of the freestone palaces of the Champs Elysées, to wear black velvet and diamonds in perpetuity, and to receive a herd of small lions and a flock of admiring nobodies twice a week. The little widow prided herself on her worship of genius. All members of the lion tribe came alike to her: painters, sculptors, singers, actors, and performers upon every variety of known and unknown musical instrument; budding barristers, who had won forensic laurels by the eloquent defense of some notorious criminal; homeopathic doctors, lady doctoresses, or lawyeresses, or deaconesses, from America; and pretty women who had won a kind of renown by something special in the way of eyebrows, or arms, or shoulders.

To these crowded saloons Mr. Granger brought his wife and daughter one evening. They found a great many people assembled in three lofty rooms hung with amber satin, in the remotest and smallest of which apartments Madame Caballero made tea à l'Anglaise for her intimates; while in the largest some fearful and wonderful instrumental music was going on, with the very smallest possible amount of attention from the audience. There was a perpetual buzz of conversation; and there was a considerable sprinkling of curious-looking people, weird men with long, unkempt hair, strong-minded women, who counterbalanced these in a manner by wearing their hair preternaturally short. Altogether, the assembly was an unusual one; but Madame Caballero's guests seemed to enjoy themselves very much. Their good spirits may have been partly due to the fact that they had the pleasing anticipation of an excellent supper, furnished with all the choicest dainties that Chevet can provide; for Madame Caballero's receptions were of a substantial order, and she owed a good deal of her popularity to the profusion that distinguished the commissariat department.

Mr. and Mrs. Granger made their way to the inner room by-and-by. It was the prettiest room of the three, with a great semicircular window overlooking nothing particular in the daytime, but making a handsome amber-hung recess at night. Here there was a sea-coal fire à l'Anglaise, and only a subdued glimmering of wax-candles, instead of the broad glare in the larger saloons. Here, too, were to be found the choicest of Madame Caballero's guests: a cabinet minister, an embassador, a poet of some standing, and one of the most distinguished sopranos of the season, a fair-haired German girl, with great pathetic blue eyes.

Even in this society Madame Caballero was rejoiced to see her sweet Mrs. Granger and her charming Miss Granger, who was looking unutterably stiff in mauve silk and white lace. The lady and her friends had been talking of some one as the Grangers entered—talking rapturously.

"J'en raffole!" exclaimed madame; "such a charming young man, gifted with talents of the most original order."

The embassador was looking at a portrait—the likeness of Madame Caballero herself—a mere sketch in oils, with a mark of the brush upon it, but remarkable for the chic and daring of the painter's style, and for that idealized resemblance which is always so agreeable to the subject.

Clarissa's heart gave a little throb. The picture was like one she had seen on the easel in the Rue du Chevalier Bayard.

"Mais c'est charmant!" exclaimed the embassador; and the adjective was echoed in every key by the rest of the little coterie.

"I expect him here this evening," said madame; "and I shall be very much gratified if you will permit me to present him to your excellency."

The embassador bowed. "Any protégé of madame's," he said, and so on.

Mr. Granger, who was really a judge of art, fastened on the picture immediately.

"There's something fresh in the style, Clary," he said. "I should like this man to paint your portrait. What's the signature? Austin! That's hardly a French name, I should think—eh, Madame Caballero?"

"No," replied madame; "Mr. Austin is an Englishman. I shall be charmed if you will allow him to paint Mrs. Granger; and I'm sure he will be delighted to have such a subject."

There was a good deal of talk about Mr. Austin's painting, and art in general. There were some half dozen pictures of the modern French school in this inner room, which helped to sustain the conversation. Mr. Granger talked very fair French, of a soundly grammatical order; and Clarissa's tongue ran almost as gayly as in her school-girl days at Belforêt. She was going to see her brother—to see him shining in good society, and not in the pernicious "set" of which George Fairfax had spoken. The thought was rapture to her. They might have a few minutes' talk to themselves, perhaps, before the evening was over. That interview in the Rue du Chevalier Bayard had been so sadly brief, and her heart too full for many words.

Austin Lovel came in presently, looking his handsomest, in his careful evening dress, with a brilliant light in his eyes, and that appearance of false brightness which is apt to distinguish the man who is burning the candle of life at both ends. Only by just the faintest elevation of his eyebrows did he betray his surprise as he looked at his sister; and his air, on being presented to her a few moments afterward, was perfect in its serene unconsciousness.

Mr. Granger talked to him of his picture pleasantly enough, but very much as he would have talked to his architect, or to one of his clerks in the great Bradford establishment. There was a marked difference between the tone of the rich English trader and the German embassador, when he expressed himself on the subject of Mr. Austin's talent; but then the Englishman intended to give the painter a commission, and the German did not.

"I should like you to paint my wife—and—and—my daughter," said Mr. Granger, throwing in Sophia as an after-thought. It would be only civil to have his daughter's portrait painted, he thought.

Mr. Austin bowed. "I shall be most happy," he said.

Clarissa's eyes sparkled with delight. Sophia Granger saw the pleased look, and thought, "Oh, the vanity of these children of perdition!" But she did not offer any objection to the painting of her own likeness.

"When shall we begin?" asked Mr. Granger.

"My time is entirely at your disposal."

"In that case, the sooner the thing is done the better. My wife can not come to your studio—she has so many claims upon her time—but that would make no difficulty, I suppose?"

"Not at all. I can paint Mrs. Granger in her own rooms as well as in mine, if the light will serve."

"One of our drawing-rooms faces the north," answered Mr. Granger, "and the windows are large—larger than I like. Any loss of time which you may suffer in accommodating Mrs. Granger must, of course, be considered in the price of your pictures."

"I have only one price for my pictures," replied Mr. Austin, with a loftiness that astonished his patron. "I charge fifty guineas for a portrait of that kind, whether it is painted for a duke or a grocer in the Rue St. Honoré."

"I will give you a hundred guineas for each of the pictures if they are successes," said Mr. Granger. "If they are failures I will give you your own price, and make you a present of the canvases."

"I am not a stoic, and have no objection to accept a premium of a hundred guineas from so distinguished a capitalist as Mr. Granger," returned Austin Lovel, smiling. "I don't think Mrs. Granger's portrait will be a failure," he added, confidently, with a little look at Clarissa.

Sophia Granger saw the look, and resented it. The painter had said nothing of her portrait. It was of Clarissa's only that he thought. It was a very small thing; but when her father's wife was concerned, small things were great in the eyes of Miss Granger.

There was no opportunity for confidential talk between Austin Lovel and his sister that evening; but Clarissa went home happy in the expectation of seeing her brother very often in the simplest, easiest way. The portraits would take some time to paint, of course; indeed, Austin might make the business last almost as long as he liked.

It was rather hard, however, to have to discuss her brother's merits with Mr. and Miss Granger as if he had been a stranger; and Clarissa had to do this going home in the carriage that night and at breakfast next morning. The young man was handsome, Mr. Granger remarked, but had rather a worn look—a dissipated look, in point of fact. That sort of people generally were dissipated.

Mrs. Granger ventured to say that she did not think Mr. Austin looked dissipated—a little worn, perhaps, but nothing more; and that might be the effect of hard work.

"My dear Clary, what can you know of the physiology of dissipation? I tell you that young man is dissipated. I saw him playing écarté with a Frenchman just before we left Madame Caballero's; and, unless I am profoundly mistaken, the man is a gambler."

Clarissa shuddered. She could not forget what George Fairfax had said to her about her brother's ways, nor the fact that her remittances had seemed of so little use to him. He seemed in good repute too, and talked of fifty guineas for a picture with the utmost coolness. He must have earned a good deal of money, and the money must have gone somewhere. In all the details of his home there was evidence of extravagance in the past and poverty in the present.

He came at eleven o'clock on the second morning after Madame Caballero's reception; came in a hired carriage, with his easel and all the paraphernalia of his art. Mr. Granger had made a point of being present at this first sitting, much to the discomfiture of Clarissa, who was yearning for a long, uninterrupted talk with her brother. Even when Mr. Granger was absent, there would be Miss Granger, most likely, she thought, with vexation; and, after all, these meetings with Austin would be only half meetings. It would be pleasant only to see him, to hear his voice; but she was longing to talk freely of the past, to give him counsel for the future.

The drawing-room looking north was rather a dreary apartment, if any apartment furnished with blue satin damask and unlimited gilding can be called dreary. There was splendor, of course, but it was a chilling kind of splendor. The room was large and square, with two tall, wide windows commanding a view of one of the dullest streets in new Paris—a street at the end of which workmen were still busy cutting away a hill, the removal whereof was necessary for the realization of the Augustan idea of that archetypal city, which was to be left all marble. Mr. Granger's apartments were in a corner house, and he had the advantage of this side view. There was very little of what Mr. Wemmick called "portable property" in this northern drawing-room. There were blue satin divans running along the walls, a couple of blue satin easy-chairs, an ormolu stand with a monster Sèvres dish for cards, and that was all—a room in which one might "receive," but could scarcely live.

The light was capital, Mr. Austin said. He set up his easel, settled the position of his sister, after a little discussion with Mr. Granger, and began work. Clarissa's was to be the first portrait. This being arranged, Mr. Granger departed to write letters, leaving Sophia established, with her Berlin-wool work, at one of the windows. Clarissa would not, of course, like to be left tête-à-tête for two or three hours with a strange painter, Miss Granger opined.

Yes, it was very pleasant to have him there, even though their talk was restrained by the presence of a third person, and they could only speak of indifferent things. Perhaps to Austin Lovel himself it was pleasanter to have Miss Granger there than to be quite alone with his sister. He was very fond of Clarissa, but there was much in his past life—some things in his present life even—that would not bear talking of, and he shrank a little from his sister's tender questioning. Protected by Miss Granger and her Berlin-wool spaniels, he was quite at his ease, and ran gayly on about all manner of things as he sketched his outline and set his palette. He gave the two ladies a lively picture of existing French art, with little satirical touches here and there. Even Sophia was amused, and blushed to find herself comparing the social graces of Mr. Austin, the painter, with those of Mr. Tillott, the curate, very much to the advantage of the former—blushed to find herself so much interested in any conversation that was not strictly utilitarian or evangelical in its drift. Once or twice Austin spoke of his travels, his Australian experiences; and at each mention Clarissa looked up eagerly, anxious to hear more. The history of her brother's past was a blank to her, and she was keenly interested by the slightest allusion that cast a ray of light upon it. Mr. Austin did not care, however, to dwell much upon his own affairs. It was chiefly of other people that he talked. Throughout that first sitting Miss Granger maintained a dignified formality, tempered by maidenly graciousness. The young man was amusing, certainly, and it was not often Miss Granger permitted herself to be amused. She thought Clarissa was too familiar with him—treated him too much with an air of perfect equality. A man who painted portraits for hire should be received, Miss Granger thought, as one would receive a superior kind of boot-maker.

More than once, in fact, in the course of that agreeable morning Clarissa had for a moment forgotten that she was talking to Mr. Austin, the painter, and not to her brother, Austin Lovel. More than once an unconscious warmth or softness in her tone had made Miss Granger look up from her embroidery-frame with the eyes of wonder.

Mr. Granger came back to the drawing-room, having finished his letter-writing, just as the sitting concluded, and, luncheon being announced at the same time, asked Mr. Austin to stay for that meal. Austin had no objection to linger in his sister's society. He wanted to know what kind of man this Daniel Granger was; and perhaps wanted to see what probability there was of Daniel Granger's wife being able to supply him with money in the future. Austin Lovel had, from his earliest boyhood, possessed a fatal capacity for getting rid of money, and for getting into debt; not common plain-sailing debt which would lead at the worst to the Bankruptcy Court, but liability of a more disreputable and perilous character, involving the terror of disgrace, and entanglements that would have to be unraveled by a police magistrate. Racing debts, gambling debts, and bill-discounting transactions had been the agreeable variety of difficulties which had beset Austin Lovel's military career; and at the end there had been something—something fully known to a few only—which had made the immediate sale of his commission a necessity. He was allowed to sell it; and that was much, his friends said. If his commanding officer had not been an easy-going kind of man, he would scarcely have got off so cheaply.

"I wonder how this fellow, Granger, would treat me if he knew who I was?" he thought to himself. "He'd inaugurate our acquaintance by kicking me out of his house, most likely, instead of asking me to luncheon." Notwithstanding which opinion Mr. Austin sat down to share the sacred bread and salt with his brother-in-law, and ate a few morsels of a cutlet à la Maintenon, and drank half a bottle of claret, with a perfect enjoyment of the situation. He liked the idea of being patronized by the man who would not have tolerated his society for a moment had he been aware of his identity.

He talked of Parisian life during luncheon, keeping carefully clear of all subjects which the "young person," as represented by Miss Granger, might blush to hear; and Mr. Granger, who had only an Englishman's knowledge of the city, was amused by the pleasant gossip. The meal lasted longer than usual, and lost all its wonted formality; and the fair Sophia found herself more and more interested in this fascinating painter, with his brilliant dark eyes, and sarcastic mouth, and generally agreeable manner. She sat next him at luncheon, and, when there came a little pause in the conversation, began to question him about the state of the Parisian poor. It was very bad, was it not?

Mr. Austin shrugged his shoulders.

"I don't know," he said; "but I don't think it would be possible for a man to starve to death in Paris under the imperial régime; and it seems very easy for an Englishman to do it in Spitalfields or Mile-end New Town. You don't hear of men and women found dead in their garrets from sheer hunger. But, of course, there is a good deal of poverty and squalor to be found in the city."

And then Mr. Austin launched into a graphic description of some interesting phases of life among the lower classes, borrowed from a novel that had been recently delighting the reading public of France, but appropriated with such an air of reality that Miss Granger fancied this delightful painter must spend some considerable part of his existence as a district visitor or city missionary.

"What a pity that Mr. Tillott has not his persuasive powers!" she thought; Mr. Tillott's eloquence being, in fact, of a very limited order, chiefly exhibiting itself in little jerky questions about the spiritual and temporal welfare of his humble parishioners—questions which, in the vernacular language of agricultural laborers, "put a chap's back up, somehow."

"I should like to show Mr. Austin the baby, Daniel," Clarissa said to her husband, shyly, while Miss Granger was keeping Austin hard and fast to the amelioration of the working classes; "he would make such a lovely picture."

Mr. Granger smiled—a quiet, well-satisfied smile. He, the strong man, the mill-owner and millionaire, was as weak as the weakest woman in all things concerning the child of his mature age.

"Yes," he said, with some affectation of indifference; "Lovel would make a nice picture enough. We'll have him painted if you like, Clary, some day. Send for him, my dear."

She had her hand upon the bell directly.

"Yes," she cried, "he would make the sweetest picture in the world, and Austin shall paint him."

The familiar mention of the name Austin, tout court, scared Mr. Granger almost as much as a cannon fired close at his elbow might have done. He stared at his wife with grave displeasure.

"Mr. Austin can paint him some day, if you wish it, Clarissa," he said.

Mrs. Granger blushed crimson; again she remembered that this brother she loved so dearly was only a strange painter of portraits, whom it behooved her to treat with only the most formal courtesy. She hated the deception; and having a strong faith in her husband's generosity, was sorely tempted to put an end to this acted lie on the spot, and to tell him who his guest was; but fear of her brother's anger stopped her. She had no right to betray him; she must wait his permission to tell the secret.

"Even Sophia seems to like him," she thought; "and I don't think Daniel could help being pleased with him, in spite of any thing papa may have said to his prejudice."

The baby was brought, and, being in a benignant humor, was graciously pleased to look his brightest and prettiest, and in nurse's phraseology, to "take to" his unknown uncle. The unknown uncle kissed him affectionately, and said some civil things about the color of his eyes, and the plumpness of his limbs—"quite a Rubens baby," and so on, but did not consider a boy-baby an especially wonderful creature, having had two boy-babies of his own, and not having particularly wanted them. He looked upon them rather as chronic perplexities, like accommodation bills that had matured unawares.

"And this is the heir of Arden," he said to himself, as he looked down at the fat, blue-eyed thing struggling in Clarissa's arms with that desperate desire to get nowhere in particular common to infancy. "So this little lump of humanity is the future lord of the home that should have been mine. I don't know that I envy him. Country life and Arden would hardly have suited me. I think I'd rather have an entresol in the Champs Elysées and the run of the boulevards than the gray old Court and a respectable position. Unless a man's tastes are 'horsey' or agricultural, country life must be a bore."

Mr. Austin patted the plump young cheeks without any feeling of enmity.

"Poor little beggar! What ghosts will haunt him in the old rooms by-and-by, I wonder?" he said to himself, smiling down at the child.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

AUSTIN'S PROSPECTS.

THE picture made rapid progress. For his very life, though the finishing of his work had been the signal of his doom, and the executioner waiting to make a sudden end of him when the last touch was laid upon the canvas, Austin Lovel could not have painted slowly. The dashing off-hand brush was like a young thorough-bred, that could not be pulled, let the jockey saw at his mouth as he might. And yet the painter would have liked much to prolong this easy intercourse with his sister. But after Clarissa's portrait was finished there was Miss Granger to be painted; and then they would want a picture of that unapproachable baby, no doubt; and after that, perhaps, Mr. Granger might consent to have his massive features perpetuated. Austin considered that the millionaire should be good for three hundred guineas or so; he had promised two hundred, and the painter was spending the money by anticipation as fast as he could.

He came every other morning to the Rue de Morny, and generally staid to luncheon; and those mornings spent in his company were very pleasant to Clarissa—as pleasant as any thing could be which involved deception; there was always the sting of that fact. Miss Granger was rarely absent for ten minutes together on these occasions; it was only some lucky chance which took her from the room to fetch more Berlin wool, or a forgotten skein of floss silk for the perennial spaniels, and afforded the brother and sister an opportunity for a few hurried words. The model villagers almost faded out of Miss Granger's mind in this agreeable society. She found herself listening to talk about things which were of the earth, earthy, and was fain to confess herself interested in the conversation. She dressed as carefully to receive the painter as if he had been, to use her particular phraseology, "a person in her own sphere;" and Mr. Tillott would have thought his chances of success at a very low point if he could have seen her in Austin Lovel's presence.

That gentleman himself was not slow to perceive the impression he had made.

"It's rather a pity I'm married, isn't it, Clary?" he said to his sister one day, when Sophia, whose habits had not been quite so methodical of late, had gone in search of some white beads for the spaniels, some of which were of a beady nature. "It would have been a great chance for me, wouldn't it?"

"What do you mean, Austin?"

"Miss Granger," answered the painter, without looking up from his work. "I think she rather likes me, do you know; and I suppose her father will give her fifty thousand or so when she marries, in spite of young Lovel. He seems to have no end of money. It would have been an uncommonly good thing, wouldn't it?"

"I don't think it's any use talking of it, Austin, however good it might have been; and I don't think Sophia would have suited you as a wife."

"Not suited me? Bosh! Any woman with fifty thousand pounds would have suited me. However, you're right—there's no good in talking of that. I'm booked. Poor little woman, she's a good wife to me; but it's rather a pity. You don't know how many chances I might have had but for that entanglement."

"I wish, Austin, for your poor wife's sake, you'd let me tell my husband who you are. This concealment seems so hard upon her, as well as a kind of wrong to Daniel. I can do so little to serve her, and I might do so much if I could own her as my sister-in-law. I don't think Daniel could help liking you if he knew every thing."

"Drop that, if you please, Clarissa," said Austin, with a darkening countenance. "I have told you that your husband and I can never be friends, and I mean it. I don't want to be degraded by any intercession of yours. That's a little too much, even for me. It suits my purpose well enough to accept Mr. Granger's commissions; and, of course, it's very agreeable to me to see you; but the matter must end there."

Miss Granger returned at this moment; but had she staid away for an hour Clarissa could scarcely have pressed the question farther. In the old days, when they had been boy and girl together, Austin seven years her senior, Clarissa had always been just a little afraid of her brother; and she was afraid of him now.

The very fact of his somewhat dependent position made her more fearful of offending him. She was anxious about his future—anxious, too, about his present mode of life; but she dared not question him closely upon either subject. Once, when she had ventured to ask him about his plan of life, he answered, in his careless, off-hand way:

"My dearest Clary, I have no plans. I like Paris; and if I am not particularly successful here, I don't suppose I should be more successful any where else. I mean to stay here as long as I can hold out. I know a good many people, and sometimes get a stroke of luck."

"But you are ruining your health, Austin, I fear, with—late hours and—and—parties."

"Who told you I keep late hours? The Parisians, as a rule, don't go to bed at curfew. I don't suppose I'm worse than my neighbors. If I didn't go out, Clary, and keep myself in the minds of my patrons, I might rot in a garret. You don't know how soon a man is forgotten—even a man who has made his mark more positively than I have; and then, you see, my dear, I like society, and have no taste for the domestic hearth, except for variety, once in a way, like dining on a bouillon after a week's high feeding. Yes, come what may, I shall stay in Paris—as long as I can."

There was something in the tone of the last words that alarmed Clarissa.

"You—you are not in debt, are you, Austin?" she asked, timidly.

"No—no—I'm not in debt; but I owe a good deal of money."

Clarissa looked puzzled.

"That is to say, I have no vulgar debts—butcher and baker, and so on; but there are two or three things, involving some hundreds, which I shall have to settle some of these days, or else—"

"Or else what, Austin?"

"Cut Paris, Clary; that's all."

Clarissa turned pale. Austin began to whistle a popular café-chantant air as he bent over his palette, squeezing little dabs of Naples-yellow out of a leaden tube. Some hundreds!—that was a vague phrase which might mean a great deal of money; it was a phrase which alarmed Clarissa; but she was much more alarmed by the recklessness of her brother's tone.

"But if you owe money, you must pay it, Austin," she said; "you can't leave a place owing money."

The painter shrugged his shoulders.

"It's not an agreeable thing to do," he said; "but it has been done. Of the two, it's pleasanter than staying in a place where you owe money."

"Of course I shall do all I can to help you, dear," said his sister. "There will be a hundred and twenty-five pounds due to me at Christmas, and I'll give you the hundred."

"You're a first-rate girl, Clary; but I think that fellow Granger might give you more pin-money. Five hundred a year is a beggarly pittance for a man of his means."

"It is more than I fancied I could ever want; and Daniel allows papa five hundred a year, you know, Austin."

"Humph! that makes a thousand—no great things for a millionaire. A pretty girl married to a man of that stamp ought to have unlimited command of money," replied her brother. "It's the only compensation," he said to himself afterward.

"I don't like to hear you say these things, Austin. My husband is very kind to me. I'm afraid I'm not half as grateful as I ought to be."

"Gratitude be—!" He did not finish the ejaculation. "Gratitude from a Lovel of twenty to a Granger of fifty! My dear Clary, that's too good a joke! The man is well enough—better than I expected to find him; but such a girl as you is a prize for which such a man could not pay too highly."

It was rarely they had the opportunity for so long a conversation as this; and Austin was by no means sorry that it was so. He had very pressing need of all the money his sister could give him; but he did not care to enter into explanations about the state of his affairs.

[TO BE CONTINUED NEXT WEEK.]

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE perils to which whaling vessels are exposed are vividly portrayed in the recent accounts that have reached us of the great disaster in the Arctic Ocean. About the 1st of last May a fleet of forty whalers, having on board 1250 persons, was slowly making its way toward the polar sea. Before Behring Strait was reached the ice met the ships, and delayed their progress. The latter part of June they passed through the strait, and, with some delays for catching whales and walrus, they pushed on toward Icy Cape, northeast of Alaska. It was August when the brave whalers found themselves above seventy degrees north latitude, with plenty of ice about them, it is true, but plenty of whales also, and for some days work went on briskly. But violent winds set in, driving the ice shoreward, and with great force against the ships. Gradually huge icebergs surrounded the fleet on the west side. One vessel after another was caught in the iron grasp of icy monsters, and, being hastily abandoned, were crushed in pieces, like egg-shells. Anxiously the masters of the ships watched for an opening in the solid body of ice, all their former experience leading them to expect it at that time of year; but every day it became more closely packed. The situation was becoming fearfully dangerous; no efforts could free the vessels; a winter of nine months in the polar sea was not to be thought of, as provisions were lacking; nor was it possible, with provisions, as there was no place of safety for the ships. There was no alternative but to abandon the vessels; and on September 14 thirty-three vessels were left to their fate among the icebergs, while in boats, through a narrow strip of clear water along the coast, the wrecked whalers proceeded to the remainder of the fleet anchored south of Icy Cape, a distance of seventy miles. The intense suffering involved in such an experience may be imagined. Four women, wives of ship-masters, and four children are reported as sharing in this perilous adventure.

The English government eclipse expedition, which sailed from Southampton for Ceylon on October 26, expect to reach Point de Galle by the last of November. Lord Lindsay placed at the disposal of the expedition the whole of his valuable instruments, and has sent a photographic observer at his own expense. Several members of the expedition have voluntarily given up a month of their time before starting to perfect themselves in spectroscopic and other observations at the Royal College of Chemistry.

The convicts of the Massachusetts Penitentiary sent six hundred dollars to the General Relief Fund for Chicago sufferers—a most remarkable instance of charity.

A Western man who had acquired an immense fortune by the rise of real estate in Chicago on one occasion was induced to visit New York. On his return he was asked what he thought of the great city. He said it was very well, a grand place, and had but one fault.

"And what is that?" inquired his interlocutor.

"It is too far from Chicago!"

In this reply may be detected the secret of the rapid growth of the "Garden City."

Perhaps many of our readers, who were quietly pursuing their ordinary occupations on the 7th of last September, may not have been aware that about noon of that day a tremendous explosion occurred in the sun. But so astronomers testify. There had been observed an enormous protuberance on the eastern limb of the sun, about 100,000 miles long by 50,000 miles high. This "thing" burst in pieces, and the air seemed filled with debris, some of which rose 300,000 miles from the solar surface! While the astronomical observer at Dartmouth College was noting these marvelous changes, another nebulous mass developed into a pillar of rolling flame, apparently, and presently shot up pyramidally 50,000 miles in height, when its top was drawn out in long filaments and threads. Yet dwellers on the earth were in blissful ignorance of these terrific explosions.

The observatory on Mount Washington is now tenanted by Sergeant Hearn, of the United States army, and a single companion. They will remain there during the winter for scientific observations.

The Chicago Tribune says there have been not less than nine hundred causes assigned for the Chicago conflagration by people who reside far away, and know little or nothing about the circumstances. The Tribune thinks it difficult to see how the fire, having once got started as it did, could have burned any less, when there were acres of wooden buildings, dry as touch-wood, and the wind acting like a most powerful blow-pipe.

In discussing the mooted question, "What quantity of sleep is necessary?" one writer says that tall and fleshy persons require more sleep than short and thin ones. No reason is assigned for this theory.

The frozen well at Brandon, Vermont, has recently been the subject of a report by a committee of the Boston Society of Natural History. This curious well remains frozen through the summer months. For twelve years past it has been made a subject of investigation by a committee appointed by this society. Various experiments have been tried for the purpose of gaining an explanation of this phenomenon. Some have suggested that the water dissolves something from the rocks which makes a freezing mixture; others have believed that the cause might be traced to some electric current. But chemical analysis, and repeated tests with the magnetic needle, disprove these theories. The committee are of opinion that the gravel bed surrounding the well was frozen by the cold of previous rigorous winters, and the wave of summer heat has not yet overcome that cold.

Father Hyacinthe seems to be performing a mission work in lecturing through the cities of Germany with a view of conciliating the feelings of the Germans toward the French. When his work there is completed he will lecture in France with a similar purpose.

Juanpoor was a flourishing city of British India. It contained nearly nine thousand houses, and more than 25,000 inhabitants. On the 15th of September the river Goomty rose suddenly, flooding the city south of the river. By evening of the next day the foundations of the houses began to give way, and one by one came crashing down. For several days the waters increased and prevailed, and at the latest accounts it was estimated that about three thousand houses had been destroyed, and 10,000 persons deprived of their homes. The whole of the city south of the river has been totally destroyed, and the north side seriously injured. No lives were lost, as the people had the good sense to remove their families as soon as danger became imminent. But this disaster, accompanied as it is by a deficient harvest, will inflict a blow upon the city from which it will with difficulty recover.

A trail having been laid to the summit of Pike's Peak, a young lady of Greeley has made the ascent—the first and only woman who has accomplished the feat.

The corporation of the University of Vermont has decided that women shall be admitted to the academic and scientific courses of the university.

The Evening Post says: "On the top of the small tool-house and keeper's tower on the east side of Union Square may now be seen a disordered pile of a hundred or more sparrows' houses. This heap of torn-down houses is to the birds what the ruins of Chicago are to the people of that city. Probably there is no intention of putting [illegible] up in the square again; indeed, [illegible] they were taken are, in many cases, [illegible]." The English sparrows—so called, but really now American sparrows—are not migratory. So long as food can be obtained, climate and locality are matters of indifference to them. Moreover, they do not care to build nests for themselves; a house prepared is always acceptable, if it be in a safe place. The work the sparrows do for our city is well known and appreciated. They are entitled to be well taken care of when Jack Frost interferes with their labor, and prevents them from getting their daily food. Their gentle confidence, as they make their mute appeal for food at door and window, deserves reward. Give them the waste crumbs, and even take the trouble to prepare a house for their comfort.

Poor as France is at the present time, when the news of Chicago's misfortune reached Paris a French committee was chosen to collect subscriptions, at the head of which, as president, was the name of Edouard Laboulaye. M. Augustin Cochin, a well-known leader of the liberal Catholic party, was vice-president, and among other names of its members were those of M. De Pressensé, the celebrated Protestant minister and Deputy; Henri Martin, the historian; Goupil, the print-seller, as well known in New York as in Paris; and Vanhymbecke, director of the Grand Hôtel. "France is very poor," they said; "but she must make some return, were it only as a mark of sympathy, for what she has so liberally received."

The returns for the taxe mobilier, or furnished-house tax, in Paris, show that not less than eighty thousand such premises are now standing without occupants—a marked indication of the diminution of the population.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. J. B.—We are not certain, but think it probable, that we may give a boy's overcoat pattern.

A MOTHER.—The prettiest cloak for a child of two or three years is of cashmere or merino braided, and cut by the Walking Coat pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 27, Vol. IV.

H. D.—The simplest short basque, coat sleeves, and plain skirt is the model for your purple goods, which is not Irish poplin, but epingeline. Trim with velvet collar and cuffs.

FLETA.—The Water-proof Cloak pattern in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV., is the fashionable shape. It is heavy enough without lining. You know best whether it will suit you for a church garment. It is only worn here in rainy weather.

MISS A. R. B.—We do not make trimmed patterns.

E. H. F.—Make a young lady's black silk suit by cut paper pattern of Vest-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 41, Vol. IV.; the evening dress by pattern of Trained Evening Dress shown in Bazar No. 38, Vol. III.

POSTMISTRESS.—Make your calicoes with box-pleated blouse-waist and long upper skirt. Alpacas are also made with double box-pleated waists. Trim with the same in kilt pleats, not with white alpaca. White corduroy makes a nice sacque, and will wash. You can order a Bazar containing sacque patterns from this office.

MRS. JOHN.—For information about point lace braid read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 47, Vol. IV., and find advertisement in the present number.

MRS. J.—Back numbers of the Bazar will furnish you Supplement patterns of double capes and Watteau sacques for your velvet garment.

CARA, OIL CITY.—Your black cashmere is very fair quality. The other samples are bottle green and stone-colored satine. Do not know what they ought to cost in your city.

JANE M.—The Bazar does not give addresses. Advertisements of furnishing houses in our columns will tell you what you want to know.

H. B. P.—Make your plaid dress by cut paper pattern of House Dress in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV. Your over-skirt will answer with other skirts.

MISS G. C.—Some of Worth's richest evening dresses have two or three colors. Make the three front breadths of your dress rose-colored silk, flounced with the same; make a very short apron and the demi-trained back widths of the gray silk, extending a ruffle of gray all around this trained upper skirt. Combine the two colors in the corsage.

MRS. A. B. S.—Make your daughter's black silk by our vest-basque pattern, trimmed with velvet and fringe. Get a warm Astrakhan or fur-seal cloak for yourself.

NAN.—Do not put white under the black lace on a winter suit for the street, and do not alter your Watteau basque, as it is in good style.

CLINTON.—Get a wine-colored poplin, and trim with velvet and fringe instead of plush or satin. Your black silk sacque seems to be in style. Make your poplin by cut paper pattern of House Dress in Bazar No. 48, or else Worth-Basque Dress in No. 1, Vol. IV. Your chené silk would look pretty in the house made with a basque and skirt looped up, à la Dolly Varden, over a black silk skirt. Your friend's myrtle green cashmere is extremely fashionable, and would be spoiled if she attempted to relieve what you call its "sombre look" by a contrasting color. As she is fleshy, she should use the Marguerite Polonaise pattern in Bazar No. 37, Vol. IV., trimming the skirt with alternate pleatings of cashmere and silk of the same shade; the polonaise with a silk fold, or passementerie and fringe. Velvet does not look well on cashmere, and satin is not much used this season. A sultane red neck-tie is the only relief necessary to this stylish dark suit.

BRUNETTE.—Basques will be worn all winter. Get a black velvet basque; but an under-skirt of black velvet is more stylish than an over-skirt. The foundation of the toilette should be black. We do not answer questions about MS. in this column.

MARY GRAY.—Make a French twist of your own hair, and wind braids around it. Wear the front over a Pompadour roll, or else lightly frizzed.

MRS. H. A. B.—Our advertising columns will inform you about embroidery patterns.

DILEMMA.—Read about wraps in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 45, Vol. IV. A striped shawl is the best outlay for your $10. Make a basque and demi-train of your brown silk, and trim with velvet and fringe of the same color.

M. A. Y.—Use the Adjustable Train Skirt pattern illustrated in this number for your lavender silk. Make a basque and long sleeves. If this is too dressy, use the House Dress pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV.

ANNIE J. AND MANY OTHERS.—All inquirers about wedding toilettes will gather replies from the New York Fashions of this number.

A. M. H.—The House Dress pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV., is what you want for your blue poplin. Trim with velvet bands, fringe, and side pleating. Wear a black velvet bow at your throat. Wear your hair loose in a net until it has grown longer.

Carriage-leather Mat, Figs. 1-3.

See illustrations on page 772.

To make this mat cut one circular piece of card-board ten inches and a half in diameter and two pieces of gray carriage leather, and on one of these work the design. The star is cut of maroon carriage leather, and sewed on the foundation with button-hole stitches and point Russe embroidery of maroon silk. From the hollow of each point to the opposite hollow of a point of the star fasten a strip of gray carriage leather a quarter of an inch wide with maroon silk. At a distance of an inch and a half from the outer edge of the mat cut slits an inch and a quarter long, as shown by the illustration. In order to cut the slits symmetrically it is well to run radiated lines from the centre on the under side of the piece of carriage leather; these lines must be three-quarters of an inch apart on the outer edge of the mat. Braid maroon strips of carriage leather three-quarters of an inch wide into the mat, as shown by the illustration; these strips are folded through the middle, so that the edges come on each other on the under side. Along the braided edge set a strip of gray carriage leather folded in a similar manner, and embroidered in point Russe with maroon saddler's silk (see illustration). Edge the mat with a braid of four strips of maroon carriage leather three-quarters of an inch wide, which are doubled through the middle, and paste the mat on the piece of card-board as well as on the piece of carriage leather on the under side. The edge shown by Fig. 2 may be used instead of the braid. This edge consists of rows of points of gray and maroon carriage leather. Cut the points from Fig. 52, Supplement; fold them on the under side first along the straight and then along the dotted lines given, and sew them on the mat. The seam made by sewing on the inner maroon row of points is covered by a strip of gray carriage leather, which is fastened with long stitches of maroon saddler's silk. The points of the outer row are trimmed in point Russe with similar silk.

Fig. 3 shows an edge for cloth mats. It consists of small cloth leaves, which are edged all around with narrow straw braid. Small straw buttons are set on between the leaves.

Knotted and Crochet Fringe for Curtains, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 772.

THIS fringe is made of white or gray wash material, or of woolen material, according to the purpose for which it is designed. First execute the knot-work with woven cord in the length required, as shown by the illustration.

To make the fringe shown by Fig. 1 only one piece of cord is required, which is arranged in knots. Work on this the upper edge with coarse cotton: 1st round.—* 2 sc. (single crochet) on the first upper loop of the next knot, 2 sc. on the following loop of the same knot, 7 ch. (chain stitch); repeat from . 2d round.— 2 sc. on the next ch. scallop of the preceding round, 4 ch.; repeat from *. 3d round.—1 sc. on every stitch of the preceding round. Finally, fasten on the thread ends for the fringe, which are cut of an even length, carefully observing the illustration, and knot the fringe strands together as shown by the illustration. For the fringe shown by Fig. 2 use five pieces of cord, two of which serve for a foundation, and must be of the length required for the fringe. The knot-work is executed on the foundation with two cords as shown by the illustration. With the fifth piece of cord form the scallops on the upper edge of the border thus far completed; then fasten on the thread ends of coarse cotton.

Edging for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 773.

Fig. 1.—This edging is worked with tatting cotton, No. 80, and with two threads (shuttles). 1st round.—Tie both threads together, * work with one thread only one ring of 6 ds. (double stitch; that is, one stitch right, one stitch left), 1 p. (picot), 6 ds. Turn the work; then work on the foundation thread one scallop of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds.: turn the work, and with one thread only work one ring of 6 ds., fasten to the p. of the ring previously worked, 6 ds., after a thread interval of one-tenth of an inch repeat from * until the edging has gained the length required. 2d round.—Tie both threads together, * work with one thread only one ring of 3 ds., and five times alternately 1 p., 3 ds., the first and last p. must be a quarter of an inch long. Now turn the work, and on the foundation thread work one scallop of 6 ds., fasten to the joining picot between the next two rings of the preceding round; turn the work, and with one thread only work one ring of 4 ds., fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, twice alternately 3 ds., 1 long p., then 4 ds. After working this ring fasten to the joining picot before referred to. Turn the work, and close to this ring on the foundation thread work one scallop of 6 ds.; turn the work and repeat from *, but now fasten every larger ring to the small ring previously worked. On the scalloped edge of the edging crochet one round as follows: * one short treble crochet between the next two scallops, 3 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. (single crochet) on the following p., 3 ch., and repeat from *.

Fig. 2.—This edging is worked with crochet cotton, No. 80. Make a foundation of the requisite length, and on it crochet the first round. 1 dc. (double crochet) on the first foundation st. (stitch), then always alternately 1 ch. (chain stitch) and 1 dc. on the second following foundation st. At the end of this, as well as of every following round, fasten the thread and cut it off. 2d round.—* 2 dc. separated by 1 ch. on the next ch. of the preceding round, 9 ch., with these pass over 5 st. of the preceding round, and repeat from . 3d round.—Always alternately 2 dc. separated by 1 ch. on the ch. between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 7 ch. 4th round.— 2 stc. (short treble crochet) separated by 1 ch. on the ch. between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 6 ch., and repeat from . 5th round.— 2 dc. separated by 1 ch. on the ch. between the next 2 dc. of the preceding round, 4 ch., 1 sc. (single crochet), with this work together the next ch. scallops of the 2d, 3d, and 4th rounds together as shown by the illustration; 4 ch., and repeat from *. 6th round.—On each ch. between the 2 dc. of the preceding round work 2 dc., 2 stc., 1 p. (picot; that is, 6 ch. and 1 sc. on the first of the 6 ch.), 2 stc., 2 dc. This completes the edging.

Design for Lamp Mat.—Point Russe and Button-hole Stitch Embroidery.

See illustration on page 773.

To make this mat transfer the completed design to soft material of one color, such as cloth, cashmere, or reps, and on the material work, first, the trimming in point Russe with saddler's silk of different colors. Then work the arabesque figures on the outer edge of the mat in button-hole stitch; these figures, however, must previously be underlaid thickly with loose cotton or worsted of the color of the silk with which they are to be worked. Finally, line the mat with carriage leather, and pink it on the outer edge. The mat may also be interlined with card-board.

Crêpe de Chine Cravat with Jabot.

See illustration on page 777.

THIS cravat is made of cherry crêpe de Chine and white lace an inch and a quarter wide. Cut a bias strip of the material twenty-two inches long and two inches and three-quarters wide, set the lace on both sides, and lay the strips in close pleats at one end to a length of sixteen inches; arrange the remaining part of this strip in a hanging loop. Cut the jabot on the bias in one piece from Fig. 15, Supplement, edge it with lace on the outer edge, excepting the top, and arrange it in pleats, bringing × on ● at the upper edge, and sewing the three ×'s along the middle on the ● above. The jabot is thus looped in such a manner as to form the fan-shaped bows, slightly parted in the middle, as seen by the illustration, and edged with Valenciennes lace.

similar letters, and border the outer edge with lace, which is partly sewed on the outside and partly on the under side of the material, observing the layers of pleats. Sew two loops trimmed with lace to the under side of the pieces arranged in this manner as shown by the illustration, and join the bow with a binding made of pleated crêpe de Chine and lace.

MODERN COSTUME.

THERE is no more harm in a woman being brightly dressed than in a flower being brightly dressed, no more wrong in an innocent woman's study of dress effects than in an orator's study of pose, or elocution, or poetic effects. Drab is not in itself holier than scarlet one whit, and the subdued colors are no more favorable to virtue than they are to artistic beauty. Nature hates them, and the notion that they are virtuous is an absurd effect of bad taste. Phryne dressed in spotless white, and among the really vicious races, like the Turks of Constantinople, female dress has as little brilliancy as grace. There is absolutely no reason for simplicity except economy, and no guild of fashion could settle what for any particular individual was economical or the reverse. The only real departure from simplicity now common is the rapidity with which a really pretty dress is laid aside, and that practice does not arise from any social pressure, but from the spirit of pecuniary ostentation which has infected society, and which is no worse in female dress than in any other department of life. As to modesty: in spite of all clamor on the subject, we venture to say dress has seldom been more modest. The last trace of immodesty has disappeared from men's dress, and there never was a time, except the few years of our own Puritan régime, when women, as a rule, were less décolletée than now. The social satirists forget the past, as they forget also to establish that there is any relation whatever between purity of life and mode of dressing—fashions the most "immodest," in English ideas, having existed among the purest societies, while vice rages among the closely veiled races of Asia. A modern grande dame would color purple at Cornelia's home costume, and consider that of a Sevillian street-walker the perfection of modest refinement.

We are not denying for a moment that a woman may dress extravagantly, or immodestly, or in an outré style, just as a man may. We only deny that there is any arbitrary standard which can enable any guild or any society to try an individual member; and maintain that in this, as in most other departments of life, there is a moral right of free-will to choose colors, to choose materials, to choose cut, without perpetual references to the moral sphygmograph, or register of the moral pulse. If a woman likes pearls, and looks pretty in pearls, and can afford pearls after satisfying other and higher claims, she has a right to pearls, without any reference to any standard whatever except her own judgment, or any regard for the fact that there are people who can not buy pearls, just as there are people who can not buy boots. Variety in costume is a good in itself and not an evil, and so is brilliancy; and the objection to low dresses has, within well understood limits, no more of real principle in it than the old Puritan's objection to curls—an absurdity, by-the-way, which thirty years ago very nearly triumphed for the second time. It became for five or six years a mark of grace to plaster the hair on the temples, instead of letting it fall in ringlets, and this even when the plastering consumed more time than the ringlets did. The world has always been ready to listen to such criticisms, for it has always consisted of men, and found a stimulant in semi-prurient satire, and of late years such criticism has had, from accidental circumstances, two additional provocations: men's dress is not visibly costly, and need not be so in reality (though most men spend more on their whole dress—that is, on the hosier as well as the tailor—than they think); and women, being debarred from holding property or earning it, always seem to be spending somebody else's money. Nevertheless, both in Europe and America, we are apt to forget that in very many instances the wife contributes her fair share to the joint fund, and is only doing with regard to dress what her husband does with regard to more varied methods of expense. The charge of extravagance depends too much on circumstances to be capable of proof by reference to any standard whatever capable of recognition by the world, and the attempt to enforce cheapness even by opinion would only end in a large amount of oppressive interference with the right of individual will.

and then Roy can have me all to himself for eight dreary months. Come, darlingest of aunties, say I may go," continued the lively girl. "I'll be here all day, you know, and I'll talk to old Uncle Zeke and Aunt Charity about the coops and the turkeys, and I'll repeat the Longer and Shorter Catechism entire to Parson Trip, if he likes to have me, and I'll crack nuts and pop corn with 'Biah and 'Kiah Pomeroy till their heads are fairly turned round on their shoulders, and I'll eat all I can, and a great deal more than I ought, and I'll try to make the old fogy festival as pleasant as ever I can, aunty, after the most ancient and orthodox models; but I must go to the Merediths' German after they are all gone, Aunt Rachel. I must indeed."

Aunt Rachel shook her head. "It is not I that would keep you, Kitty, as you very well know; but Roy objects so strongly. And you know, dear, you do flirt with Russell Meredith rather more than is suitable or becoming."

"Now, Aunt Rachel," exclaimed Kitty, the sunshine returning to her bright, girlish face, "consider Thanksgiving as already begun, if you please, and the reign of charity and good-will established. Don't let your dear old heart be anxious. I'll make it all straight with Roy. And now I really must go and look after poor old Keziah, whose astounding performances in the way of pies and cakes are all artistically arranged on the dresser shelves, waiting to be admired. They really are the most wonderful structures, aunty, and would do credit to a Parisian chef in outward adornment as well as in what Keziah calls their 'relishin' flavor.' I am to have the honor of decorating the large almond cake with a motto in pink and white caraways, the motto to be left to my selection. What shall it be? Not 'Waste not, want not;' that's too mean. Let me see: 'Indigestion waits upon excess' would be a friendly warning—don't you think so?" And bestowing another stifling caress upon her aged relative, who was now fairly vanquished and utterly helpless, Kitty Somers marched triumphantly out of the room.

It was in the long low drawing-room of Miss Rachel Somers's house at Newport that the passage at arms above recorded between herself and her fair niece took place—a house from whose large, old-fashioned windows a terraced garden and verdant lawn sloped down to the very water's edge, and which had been occupied by successive generations of the Somers family for centuries before wealth and fashion had set their seal upon the sea-girt island, and elected to hold their revels there. In that house Kitty Somers had been born; in that house her fair young mother—widowed before her baby's birth—had drifted out upon the unknown sea from whence no mortal has ever yet returned, leaving her infant daughter to Aunt Rachel's gentle care and guidance.

Here Kitty's joyous childhood had been passed; here Aunt Rachel had nurtured, pruned, and trained the wild, luxuriant nature, which blossomed so early into fresh and blooming girlhood, and promised to bring forth maturity's best fruits in after-years. And here, alas! had been sown the first seeds of vanity and frivolity by the admiration that her beauty and cleverness excited during the brief summer reign of idleness and dissipation. It was at one of the many brilliant entertainments which had been given during the previous summer, and of which Kitty had been the bright particular star, that she had first met Roy Campbell. Attracted at first by his magnificent physique, she had been repelled, on a closer acquaintance, by his cold and distant manner, and again piqued, by his nonchalance and apparent indifference to her charms, to putting forth her very best powers of fascination to entrap him. From that time there had been but little peace by day or rest by night for either Roy Campbell or Kitty Somers. One perpetual skirmish and conflict had been going on with themselves and with each other. A steady, resolute determination on his part to resist the spells of the enchantress, and laugh her witcheries to scorn—an equally strong determination on hers to bring the scoffer to her feet, while she escaped scot-free herself—had ended, as such conflicts always must, in the complete subjugation of them both, and in a formal proposal from Mr. Campbell to Miss Rachel Somers for her niece's hand. So matters stood on the eve of that Thanksgiving-day, which was destined to be the turning point in Kitty Somers's life.

II.

The morning of the great Puritan festival dawned with that soft mist over the landscape which belongs to Indian summer in all parts of America, but which in Newport mingles with the sea-fog, and produces a luminous haze through which all objects take a golden tinge.

Kitty was up and in the kitchen at what she called the "screech of dawn," assisting old Keziah in her preparations for the ponderous feast; for there was not only the family dinner to prepare that day, but arrangements to be made to supply twenty-four of Miss Rachel's pensioners with a turkey, a form of cranberry jelly, and a pumpkin-pie each. These Kitty never failed to put up and distribute with her own hands, accompanying each gift with some kind inquiry or merry jest, which added tenfold to its value. Then, her morning duties ended, Kitty walked demurely at Aunt Rachel's side to the place of worship, having first donned her most bewitching "toilette," wherewith to distract the minds and ensnare the hearts of all the youthful members of the congregation, both male and female. Morning service over, no time was to be lost in arranging the abundant and luxurious repast upon which Keziah had expended her best skill, for the distant branches of the Somers family who were summoned to the Thanksgiving feast lived at Narraganset, and were obliged to take the afternoon boat on their return.

All day Kitty was in her brightest and most sparkling mood, and as Roy Campbell—who had been admitted to the family gathering—watched her lithe figure flitting from Uncle Zeke to Aunt Charity, and listened to the merry ring of her voice as she laughed and coquetted with the younger Pomeroys, he was more than ever impressed with the versatility of her rare gifts, and the impossibility of ever concentrating them upon one object in life. At last, however, the festivities of the day were over. Every one declared that it had been the most delightful and wonderful Thanksgiving they had ever known, and 'Biah and 'Kiah openly expressed the hope that they might "miss the boat, and have to stay all night"—an observation which caused Kitty to flit silently out of the room and put the hall clock thirty minutes forward.

Then she and Roy accompanied the family party to the end of the long pier, and after depositing the elders in sheltered and comfortable seats, waved a not very melancholy adieu to them from the shore. "Thank goodness, that's over!" exclaimed Kitty, as the boat pushed off into the blue waters of the bay. "I've been so good to-day that I'm sure I deserve some reward."

"Which you are going to have immediately," replied her lover, looking down tenderly into her upturned eyes. "We have still an hour of daylight—quite long enough to walk to the cliffs and watch the fog coming up over the sea."

"Yes," said Kitty, with a weary sigh; "it will rest me more to sit there than to go back home. And I must get up a little spirit and color for the dance to-night."

Roy Campbell made no reply; it was early days yet to censure or admonish, and although his mind was unalterably fixed upon keeping Kitty at home that night, yet he knew her well enough to use some tact and diplomacy in carrying out his determination. They walked on for some minutes in silence, glancing in from time to time at merry groups gathered around humble boards, until they reached at last the broad avenue which opens upon the cliffs. Here Kitty ran lightly forward, skipping from rock to rock, until she reached a jutting point which extended far out into the water, where, pulling off her hat and veil, she stood, with the salt spray beating into her face, waving her hand triumphantly to Roy, who was some distance behind. Her lover thought he had never seen her look so lovely as she did at that moment, and for an instant his heart relented, and he questioned whether it were worth while to bring a cloud over the brilliant beauty of that face by opposing her childish wishes. And then the recollection of Kitty's wild and reckless spirits in scenes of gayety rose before his mind, and with it the image of the wily, smooth, insinuating Russell Meredith, who had been his hated rival during all the previous summer.

"Isn't it lovely?" exclaimed Kitty, as her lover came up and sat down on the rock beside her. "Isn't this salt breeze, with just a soupçon of fog in it, delicious? It puts new life into one's veins."

"And it shines like diamonds in your hair, Kitty," said her lover, gazing with undisguised admiration at the abundant tresses, in which the salt drops gleamed and glistened, and then at the brightness of the cheek and lips, which the breeze had freshened, without deepening the bloom. "My darling," he added, drawing nearer to her, and taking one of her hands, which lay idly in her lap, "I have brought this as a pledge of the eternity of the bond which binds us together to-day. Will you wear it always for my sake?" And as he spoke Roy slipped upon her finger a hoop of alternate opals and diamonds of great size and brilliancy, and held it there, waiting for her reply. But Kitty's eyes seemed to be searching for the coast of Spain, so fixed were they upon the most distant line of ocean which the steadily increasing fog enabled her to see. "Kitty dearest," continued her lover, "will you promise to think of me and love me, just a little, when you wear this ring?"

"It's a great deal too costly and gorgeous," she exclaimed at last, with her usual impetuosity, and bursting into a shower of tears as she spoke. "It looks like a badge of slavery."

The words had no sooner passed her lips than Kitty was sorry that she had spoken them, so intense was the look of pain that passed over her lover's face.

"Forgive me," she said, putting her hand into his again: "I did not mean to hurt you; but indeed, Roy, this ring is a great deal too handsome for a poor girl like me to wear."

"Nothing can be too handsome for you, dearest," was the lover-like reply. "See, it has the date, 'Thanksgiving-day, 1863'—the happiest day of my life, Kitty, so far. You'll give this day entirely to me, darling, will you not?" he added. "I don't wish to be exacting, but I couldn't bear to think of you away from me to-night."

Kitty colored and hesitated. She loved Roy Campbell fervently—for there was depth as well as sparkle in Kitty's effervescent nature—but a perversity and obstinacy, with which Aunt Rachel had vainly battled during her childish days, made it hard for her to give up what she had once set her mind to do. She was young, too, and scarcely understood the importance that her lover attached to this one act of submission on her part; and so she pouted a little, and started on her homeward way with the ring still upon her finger, and a strong spirit of insubordination striving for the mastery within.

"I shall see you this evening, shall I not, dear?" said Roy, as they stood on Miss Somers's steps. "Promise me that I shall, Kitty."

"No, I won't promise," replied Kitty, angrily; "it's unkind and unreasonable, and I'll promise nothing."

As she spoke Keziah opened the door. Roy Campbell raised his hat. Kitty smiled, and waved an adieu. And so they parted, with a love stronger than death tugging at their heart-strings, and yet with a settled purpose on both sides to part rather than give up.

When Kitty Somers came home, flushed and excited, from the ball that night, her hands full of flowers and ribbons—the trophies of her evening's triumphs—there was an ominous stillness and darkness in Aunt Rachel's little parlor, which struck like a chill to her heart.

Miss Rachel, contrary to her usual custom, was still up, and sitting with her Bible open on her knees, gazing gloomily into the embers of the wood fire which were glowing on the hearth. There was no smile of welcome on her face as Kitty entered, and her voice was inexpressibly sad as she pointed to a letter which lay upon the table and said:

"Mr. Campbell has been here this evening, Catherine, and left that note for you. He goes to New York by the morning boat, and God knows whether you will ever see him again."

Kitty's hand trembled, and her heart sank, as she tore open the envelope, and read the following lines:

"I am here, and find you gone. After what passed between us this afternoon, I am forced to look upon your going as a deliberate expression of your indifference to my love, and your decided rejection of my suit. Under these circumstances, any further encouragement of the affection which will ever live in my heart for you would be unwise and unmanly. God bless you, Kitty! Keep the ring in memory of our brief hour of happiness; and if at any future time I can be of service to you, that ring will bring me from the uttermost parts of the earth to your side.

"Thanksgiving-day, 1863." "R. C."

III.

Three years have passed since Roy Campbell and Kitty Somers parted—years which, in their flight, have touched the brilliant, petulant child with the barbed arrow of sorrow and disappointment, thus maturing and developing her character into subdued and thoughtful womanhood. During all that time no tidings had ever reached Kitty of her absent lover; and after wearing his ring for two years, she had put it one day into Aunt Rachel's hands, with a great burst of tears, and said, "I shall never see him again, I know. It is all my own fault, and I have no right to wear his ring. Keep it, aunty, and send it back to him when I am dead." And then Aunt Rachel had folded the poor child in her motherly arms, and comforted her with that silent sympathy which, from her earliest years, had never failed to calm Kitty's stormiest moods.

And now, on the eve of another Thanksgiving-day, Kitty sits on the very spot where he saw her first—alone. For Aunt Rachel—the beloved friend, companion, guide—has passed away forever. No more encouragement from those loving lips—no more tender admonition from that soft, low voice—no more firm but gentle guidance over the rough places and through the dark valleys of her life's journey. Aunt Rachel is gone, and Kitty, as she bows her head upon her clasped hands, weeps as if her heart would break. So she continued to weep, violently and spasmodically, until the overburdened spirit had, in a measure, relieved itself; and then she raised her head, and, the tears still dropping slowly and silently on her black dress, fell to speculating on the problem of her future life, and how it was to be endured alone. Alone—alone—the word had a terrible significance to Kitty Somers's loving heart, and it took all her newly acquired fortitude and self-control to reconcile her to the idea of a long life in that desolate mansion, with only old Keziah for consolation and companionship.

"Oh, Roy!" she said. "My first and only love! If I could but bring you back again, how patient and submissive I would be!"

And then she shuddered as she glanced round the large, desolate room, where the twilight had already deepened into night, and the flickering fire-light brought out strange shapes and shadows on the wall, and buried her face in her hands again.

"Why doesn't Keziah bring lights?" she exclaimed at last, in a loud, petulant tone. "She can't surely be making preparations for to-morrow. I can never, never keep Thanksgiving-day again."

"Shall I alter the inscription on the ring, then, Kitty?" said a low voice close at her side; and the next moment Kitty was clasped tight against Roy Campbell's heart.

"Oh, Roy! dear Roy!" she exclaimed, as soon as she could speak; "how good of you to come just as I was ready to die of loneliness and despair! Did you know how I had missed you and longed for you through all these years, and how glad, how unutterably glad, I should be to see your dear old face again? Tell me what brought you, dear, and how you happened to arrive just on this very night, when I wanted you so much?"

"It was the ring, dearest," replied her lover, in rather a reproachful tone. "Surely you knew that I should come as soon as I received it. I was away in Japan, Kitty, and have traveled day and night since the moment it was put into my hands."

"The ring!" exclaimed Kitty. "How in the world did the ring travel after you to Japan?"

And then, as the truth flashed upon her mind, she bowed her head, while the tears streamed through her clasped fingers, and cried, "Oh, aunty! dearest and best of friends, even in death your love watches over your child, and brings her back her lost happiness again!"

So Kitty kept her second Thanksgiving in meekness and lowliness of spirit, and with a glad and thankful heart. And during all their married life neither she nor Roy have regretted the lesson of mutual concession and forbearance which the trials of their Thanksgiving taught.

LAURA SILVER BELL.

BY J. S. LE FANU, AUTHOR OF "UNCLE SILAS," ETC.

IN the five Northumbrian counties you will scarcely find so bleak, ugly, and yet, in a savage way, so picturesque a moor as Dardale Moss. The moor itself spreads north, south, east, and west, a great undulating sea of black peat and heath.

What we may term its shores are wooded wildly with birch, hazel, and dwarf oak. No towering mountains surround it; but here and there you have a rocky knoll rising among the trees, and many a wooded promontory of the same pretty, because utterly wild, forest running out into its dark level.

Habitations are thinly scattered in this barren territory, and a full mile away from the meanest was the stone cottage of Mother Carke.

Mall Carke was for many a year the sage-femme of this wild domain. She has renounced practice, however, for some years; and now, under the rose, she dabbles, it is thought, in the black-art, in which she has always been secretly skilled, tells fortunes, practices charms, and in popular esteem is little better than a witch.

Mother Carke has been away to the town of Willarden, to sell knit stockings, and is returning to her rude dwelling by Dardale Moss. To her right, as far away as the eye can reach, the moor stretches. The narrow track she has followed here tops a gentle upland, and at her left a sort of jungle of dwarf oak and brush-wood approaches its edge. The sun is sinking, blood-red, in the west. His disk has touched the broad black level of the moor, and his parting beams glare athwart the gaunt figure of the old beldam as she strides homeward, stick in hand, and bring into relief the folds of her mantle, which gleam like the draperies of a bronze image in the light of a fire. For a few moments this light floods the air—tree, gorse, rock, and bracken glare; and then it is out, and gray twilight over every thing.

All is still and sombre. At this hour the simple traffic of the thinly peopled country is over, and nothing can be more solitary.

From this jungle, nevertheless, through which the mists of evening are already creeping, she sees a gigantic man approaching her.

In that poor and primitive country robbery is a crime unknown. She therefore has no fears for her pound of tea and pint of gin and sixteen shillings in silver which she is bringing home in her pocket. But there is something that would have frighted another woman about this man.

He is gaunt, sombre, bony, dirty, and dressed in a black suit which a beggar would hardly care to pick out of the dust.

This ill-looking man nodded to her as he stepped on the road.

"I don't know you," she said.

He nodded again.

"I never sid ye neyawheere," she exclaimed, sternly.

"Fine evening, Mother Carke," he says, and holds his snuff-box toward her.

She widened the distance between them by a step or so, and said again, sternly and pale,

"I hev nowt to say to thee, whoe'er thou beest."

"You know Laura Silver Bell?"

"That's a byneyam; the lass's neyam is Laura Lew," she answered, looking straight before her.

"One name's as good as another for one that was never christened, mother."

"How know ye that?" she asked, grimly; for it is a received opinion in that part of the world that the fairies have power over those who have never been baptized.

The stranger turned on her a malignant smile.

"There is a young lord in love with her," the stranger says, "and I'm that lord. Have her at your house to-morrow night at eight o'clock, and you must stick cross pins through the candle, as you have done for many a one before, to bring her lover thither by ten, and her fortune's made. And take this for your trouble."

He extended his long finger and thumb toward her, with a guinea temptingly displayed.

"I have nowt to do wi' thee. I nivver sid thee afoore. Git thee awa'! I earned nea goold o' thee, and I'll tak' nane. Awa' wi' thee, or I'll find ane that will mak' thee!"

The old woman had stopped, and was quivering in every limb as she thus spoke.

He looked very angry. Sulkily he turned away at her words, and strode slowly toward the wood from which he had come; and as he approached it, he seemed to her to grow taller and taller, and stalked into it as high as a tree.

"I conceited there would come something o't," she said to herself. "Farmer Lew must git it done nesht Sunda'. The a'ad awpy!"

Old Farmer Lew was one of that sect who insist that baptism shall be but once administered, and not until the Christian candidate had attained to adult years. The girl had, indeed, for some time been of an age not only, according to this theory, to be baptized, but, if need be, to be married.

Her story was a sad little romance. A lady some seventeen years before had come down and paid Farmer Lew for two rooms in his house. She told him that her husband would follow her in a fortnight, and that he was in the mean time delayed by business in Liverpool.

In ten days after her arrival her baby was born, Mall Carke acting as sage-femme on the occasion; and on the evening of that day the poor young mother died. No husband came; no wedding-ring, they said, was on her finger. About fifty pounds was found in her desk, which Farmer Lew, who was a kind old fellow, and had lost his two children, put in bank for the little girl, and resolved to keep her until a rightful owner should step forward to claim her.

They found half a dozen love-letters signed "Francis," and calling the dead woman "Laura."

So Farmer Lew called the little girl Laura; and her sobriquet of "Silver Bell" was derived from a tiny silver bell, once gilt, which was found among her poor mother's little treasures after her death, and which the child wore on a ribbon round her neck.

Old Mall Carke, by some caprice for which no one could account, cherished an affection for the girl, who saw her often, and paid her many a small fee in exchange for secret indications of the future.

It was too late when Mother Carke reached her home to look for a visit from Laura Silver Bell that day.

About three o'clock next afternoon, Mother Carke was sitting knitting, with her glasses on, outside her door on the stone bench, when she saw the pretty girl mount lightly to the top of the stile at her left under the birch, against the silver stem of which she leaned her slender hand, and called,

"Mall, Mall! Mother Carke, are ye alane all by yersel'?"

"Ay, Laura lass, we can be clooas enoo, if ye want a word wi' me," says the old woman, rising, with a mysterious nod, and beckoning her stiffly with her long fingers.

The girl was, assuredly, pretty enough for a "lord" to fall in love with. Only look at her. A profusion of brown rippling hair, parted low in the middle of her forehead, almost touched her eyebrows, and made the pretty oval of her face, by the breadth of that rich line, more marked. What a pretty little nose! what scarlet lips, and large, dark, long-fringed eyes!

Her face is transparently tinged with those clear Murillo tints which appear in deeper dyes on her wrists and the backs of her hands. These are the beautiful gypsy tints with which the sun dyes young skins so richly.

The old woman eyes all this, and her pretty figure, so round and slender, and her shapely little feet, cased in the thick shoes that can't hide their comely proportions, as she stands on the top of the stile. But it is with a dark and saturnine aspect.

"Come, lass, what stand ye for atoppa t' wall, whar folk may chance to see thee? I hev a thing to tell thee, lass."

She beckoned her again.

"An' I hev a thing to tell thee, Mall."

"Come hidder," said the old woman, peremptorily.

"But ye munna gie me the creepin's" (make me tremble). "I winna look again into the glass o' water, mind ye."

The old woman smiled grimly, and changed her tone.

"Now, hunny, git tha down, and let ma see thy canny feyace," and she beckoned her again.

Laura Silver Bell did get down, and stepped lightly toward the door of the old woman's dwelling.

"Tak' this," said the girl, unfolding a piece of bacon from her apron; "and I hev a silver sixpence to gie thee, when I'm gaen away heyame."

They entered the dark kitchen of the cottage, and the old woman stood by the door, lest their conference should be lighted on by surprise.

"Afoore ye begin," said Mother Carke (I soften her patois), "I mun tell ye there's ill folk watchin' ye. What's auld Farmer Lew about, he doesna get t' Sir" (the clergyman) "to baptize theo? If he lets Sunda' next pass, I'm afeared ye'll never be sprinkled nor signed wi' cross while there's a sky aboon us."

"Agoy!" exclaims the girl; "who's lookin' after me?"

"A big black fella, as high as the kipples, came out o' the wood near Deadman's Grike, just after the sun gued down yester-e'en; I knew weel what he was, for his feet ne'er touched the road while he made as if he walked beside me. And he wanted to gie me snuff first, and I wouldna hev that; and then he offered me a gowden guinea, but I was no sic awpy, and to bring you here to-night, and cross the candle wi' pins, to call your lover in. And he said he's a great lord, and in luve wi' thee."

"And you refused him?"

"Well for thee I did, lass," says Mother Carke.

"Why, it's every word true!" cries the girl, vehemently, starting to her feet—for she had seated herself on the great oak chest.

"True, lass? Come, say what ye mean," demanded Mall Carke, with a dark and searching gaze.

"Last night I was coming heyame from the wake, wi' auld Farmer Dykes and his wife and his daughter Nell, and when we came to the stile I bid them good-night, and we parted."

"And ye came by the path alone in the night-time, did ye?" exclaimed old Mall Carke, sternly.

"I wasna afeared, I don't know why; the path heyame leads down by the wa's o' auld Hawarth Castle."

"I knaa it weel, and a dowly path it is; ye'll keep in-doors o' nights for a while, or ye'll rue it. What saw ye?"

"No freetin, mother; nowt I was feared on."

"Ye heard a voice callin' yer neyame?"

"I heard nowt that was dow but the hullyhoo in the auld castle wa's," answered the pretty girl. "I heard nor sid nowt that's dow, but mickle that's conny and gladsome. I heard singin' and laughin' a long way off, I consaited; and I stopped a bit to listen. Then I walked on a step or two, and there, sure enough, in the Pie-Mag field, under the castle wa's, not twenty steps away, I sid a grand company; silks and satins, and men wi' velvet coats, wi' gowd-lace striped over them, and ladies wi' necklaces that would dazzle ye, and fans as big as griddles; and powdered footmen, like what the shirra hed behind his coach, only these was ten times as grand."

"It was full moon last night," said the old woman.

"Sa bright 'twould blind ye to look at it," said the girl.

"Never an ill sight but the deaul finds a light," quoth the old woman. "There's a rinnin' brook thar—you were at this side, and they at that; did they try to mak' ye cross over?"

"Agoy! didn't they? Nowt but civility and kindness, though. But ye mun let me tell it my own way. They was talkin' and laughin' and eatin', and drinkin' out o' long glasses and gond cups, seated on the grass, and music was playin'; and I keekin' behind a bush at all the grand doin's; and up they gits to dance; and says a tall fella I didna see afoore, 'Ye mun step across, and dance wi' a young lord that's faan in luv wi' thee, and that's mysel';' and sure enow I keeked at him under my lashes, and a conny lad he is, to my teyaste, though he be dressed in black, wi' sword and sash, velvet twice as fine as they sells in the shop at Gouden Friars; and keekin' at me again fra the corners o' his een. And the same fella telt me he was mad in luv wi' me, and his fadder was there, and his sister, and they came all the way from Catstean Castle to see me that night; and that's t'other side o' Gouden Friars."

"Come, lass, yer no maffin; tell me true. What was he like? Was his feyace grimed wi' sut? a tall fella wi' wide shouthers, and lukt like an ill thing, wi' black clothes amaist in rags?"

"His feyace was long, but weel faured, and darker nor a gypsy; and his clothes were black and grand, and made o' velvet, and he said he was the young lord himsel'; and he lukt like it."

"That will be the same fella I sid at Deadman's Grike," said Mall Carke, with an anxious frown.

"Hoot, mudder! how cud that be?" cried the lass, with a toss of her pretty head and a smile of scorn.

But the fortune-teller made no answer, and the girl went on with her story.

"When they began to dance," continued Laura Silver Bell, "he urged me again, but I wudna step o'er; 'twas partly pride, coz I wasna dressed fine enough, and partly contrariness, or something, but gaa I wudna, not a fut. No but I more nor half wished it a' the time."

"Weel for thee thou dudstna cross the brook."

"Hoity-toity, why not?"

"Keep at heyame after nightfall, and don't ye be walking by yersel' by daylight, or any light, lang lonesome ways till after ye're baptized," said Mall Carke.

"I'm like to be married first."

"Tak' care that marriage won't hang i' the bell-ropes," said Mother Carke.

"Leave me alane for that. The young lord said he was maist daft wi' luv o' me. He wanted to gie me a conny ring wi' a beautiful stone in it. But, drat it, I was sic an awpy I wudna tak it, and he a young lord!"

"Lord, indeed! are ye daft, or dreamin'? Those fine folk, what were they? I'll tell ye. Dobies and fairies; and if ye don't du as ye're bid, they'll tak' ye, and ye'll never git out o' their hands again while grass grows," said the old woman, grimly.

"Od wite it!" replies the girl, impatiently, "who's daft or dreamin' noo? I'd 'a bin dead wi' fear, if 'twas any such thing. It cudna be; all was sa luvesome and bonny and shaply."

"Weel, and what do ye want o' me, lass?" asked the old woman, sharply.

"I want to know—here's t' sixpence—what I sud du," said the young lass. "'Twud be a pity to lose such a marrow, hey?"

"Say yer prayers, lass; I can't help ye," says the old woman, darkly. "If ye gaa wi' the people ye'll never come back. Ye munna talk wi' them, nor eat wi' them, nor drink wi' them, nor tak' a pin's worth by way o' gift fra them—mark weel what I say—or ye're lost!"

The girl looked down, plainly much vexed.

The old woman stared at her, with a mysterious frown, steadily for a few seconds.

"Tell me, lass, and tell me true, are ye in luve wi' that lad?"

"What for sud I?" said the girl, with a careless toss of her head, and blushing up to her very temples.

"I see how it is," said the old woman, with a groan, and repeated the words, sadly thinking; and walked out of the door a step or two, and looked jealously round. "The lass is witched, the lass is witched!"

"Did ye see him since?" asked Mother Carke, returning.

The girl was still embarrassed; and now she spoke in a lower tone, and seemed subdued.

"I thought I sid him, as I came here, walkin' beside me among the trees; but I consait it was only the trees themsel's that lukt like rinnin' one behind another as I walked on."

"I can tell thee nowt, lass, but what I telt ye afoore," answered the old woman, peremptorily. "Get ye heyame, and don't delay on the way; and say yer prayers as ye gaa; and let none but good thoughts come nigh ye; and put nayer foot autside the door-steyan again till ye gaa to be christened; and get that done a-Sunda' next."

And with this charge, given with grizzly earnestness, she saw her over the stile, and stood upon it watching her retreat until the trees quite hid her and her path from view.

The sky grew cloudy and thunderous, and the air darkened rapidly, as the girl, a little frightened by Mall Carke's view of the case, walked homeward by the lonely path among the trees.

She was frightened for a while after she got home. The dark looks of Mother Carke were always before her eyes, and a secret dread prevented her passing the threshold of her home again that night.

Next day it was different. She had got rid of the awe with which Mother Carke had inspired her. She could not get the tall, dark-featured lord, in the black velvet dress, out of her head. He had "taken her fancy;" she was growing to love him. She could think of nothing else.

Bessie Hennock, a neighbor's daughter, came to see her that day, and proposed a walk toward the ruins of Hawarth Castle, to gather "blaeberries." So off the two girls went together.

In the thicket, along the slopes near the ivied walls of Hawarth Castle, the companions began to fill their baskets. Hours passed. The sun was sinking near the west, and Laura Silver Bell had not come home.

Over the hatch of the farm-house door the maids leaned ever and anon with outstretched necks, watching for a sign of the girl's return, and wondering, as the shadows lengthened, what had become of her.

At last, just as the rosy sunset gilding began to overspread the landscape, Bessie Hennock, weeping into her apron, made her appearance without her companion.

Her account of their adventures was curious.

I will relate the substance of it more connectedly than her agitation would allow her to give it, and without the disguise of the rude Northumbrian dialect.

The girl said that, as they got along together among the brambles that grow beside the brook that bounds the Pie-Mag field, she on a sudden saw a very tall, big-boned man, with an ill-favored, smirched face, and dressed in worn and rusty black, standing at the other side of the little stream. She was frightened; and while looking at this dirty, wicked, starved figure, Laura Silver Bell touched her, gazing at the same tall scarecrow, but with a countenance full of confusion and even rapture. She was peeping through the bush behind which she stood, and, with a sigh, she said:

"Is na that a conny lad? Agoy! See his bonny velvet clothes, his sword and sash; that's a lord, I can tell ye; and weel I know who he follows, who he luves, and who he'll wed."

Bessie Hennock thought her companion daft.

"See how luvesome he luks!" whispered Laura.

Bessie looked again, and saw him gazing at her companion with a malignant smile, and at the same time he beckoned her to approach.

"Darrat ta! gaa not near him! he'll wring thy neck!" gasped Bessie, in great fear, as she saw Laura step forward, with a look of beautiful bashfulness and joy.

She took the hand he stretched across the stream, more for love of the hand than any need of help, and in a moment was across and by his side, and his long arm about her waist.

"Fares te weel, Bessie, I'm gain' my ways," she called, leaning her head to his shoulder; "and tell gud Fadder Lew I'm gain' my ways to be happy, and maybe, at lang last, I'll see him again."

And with a farewell wave of her hand, she went away with her dismal partner; and Laura Silver Bell was never more seen at home, or among the "coppies" and "wickwoods," the bonny fields and bosky hollows, by Dardale Moss.

Bessie Hennock followed them for a time.

She crossed the brook, and though they seemed to move slowly enough, she was obliged to run to keep them in view; and she all the time cried to her continually, "Come back, come back, bonnie Laura!" until, getting over a bank, she was met by a white-faced old man, and so frightened was she that she thought she fainted outright. At all events, she did not come to herself until the birds were singing their vespers in the amber light of sunset, and the day was over.

No trace of the direction of the girl's flight was ever discovered. Weeks and months passed, and more than a year.

At the end of that time one of Mall Carke's goats died, as she suspected, by the envious practices of a rival witch who lived at the far end of Dardale Moss.

All alone in her stone cabin the old woman had prepared her charm to ascertain the author of her misfortune.

The heart of the dead animal, stuck all over with pins, was burned in the fire; the windows, doors, and every other aperture of the house being first carefully stopped. After the heart, thus prepared with suitable incantations, is consumed in the fire, the first person who comes to the door or passes it by is the offending magician.

Mother Carke completed these lonely rites at dead of night. It was a dark night, with the glimmer of the stars only, and a melancholy night wind was soughing through the scattered woods that spread around.

After a long and dead silence there came a heavy thump at the door, and a deep voice called her by name.

She was startled, for she expected no man's voice; and, peeping from the window, she saw, in the dim light, a coach and four horses, with gold-laced footmen, and coachman in wig and cocked hat, turned out as if for a state occasion.

She unbarred the door; and a tall gentleman, dressed in black, waiting at the threshold, entreated her, as the only sage-femme within reach, to come in the coach and attend Lady Lairdale, who was about to give birth to a baby, promising her handsome payment.

Lady Lairdale! She had never heard of her.

"How far away is it?"

"Twelve miles, on the old road to Golden Friars."

Her avarice is roused, and she steps into the coach. The footman claps to the door; the glass jingles with the sound of a laugh. The tall, dark-faced gentleman in black is seated opposite; they are driving at a furious pace; they have turned out of the road into a narrower one, dark with thicker and loftier forest than she was accustomed to. She grows anxious; for she ows every road and by-path in the country ınd, and she has never seen this one.

He encourages her. The moon has risen ıve the edge of the horizon, and she sees a ıle old castle. Its summit of tower, watch-ver, and battlement glimmers faintly in the onlight. This is their destination.

She feels on a sudden all but overpowered by ep; but although she nods, she is quite con-ous of the continued motion, which has become n rougher.

She makes an effort, and rouses herself. What become of the coach, the castle, the serv-s? Nothing but the strange forest remains same.

She is jolting along on a rude hurdle, seated rushes, and a tall, big-boned man, in rags, in front, kicking with his heel the ill-favored st that pulls them along, every bone of which ks out, and holding the halter which serves reins. They stop at the door of a miserable lding of loose stone, with a thatch so sunk l rotten that the roof-tree and couples protrude crooked corners, like the bones of the wretched se, with enormous head and ears, that dragged m to the door.

The long, gaunt man gets down, his sinister e grimed like his hands.

It was the same grimy giant who had accosted on the lonely road near Deadman's Grike. t she feels that she "must go through with it" v, and she follows him into the house.

Two rush-lights were burning in the large and serable room, and on a coarse, ragged bed lay oman groaning piteously.

"That's Lady Lairdale," says the gaunt, dark n, who then began to stride up and down the m, rolling his head, stamping furiously, and mping one hand on the palm of the other, and king and laughing in the corners, where there s no one visible to hear or to answer.

Old Mall Carke recognized in the faded, half-rved creature who lay on the bed, as dark now l grimy as the man, and looking as if she had er in her life washed hands or face, the once he and pretty Laura Lew.

The hideous being who was her mate contin-l in the same odd fluctuations of fury, grief, and rriment: and whenever she uttered a groan, parodied it with another, as Mother Carke ught, in saturnine derision.

At length he strode into another room, and ged the door after him.

In due time the poor woman's pains were over, l a daughter was born.

Such an imp! with long, pointed ears, flat nose, l enormous restless eyes and mouth. It in-ntly began to yell and talk in some unknown language, at the noise of which the father looked into the room, and told the sage-femme that she should not go unrewarded.

The sick woman seized the moment of his absence to say in the ear of Mall Carke:

"If ye had not been at ill work to-night, he could not hev fetched ye. Tak' no more now than your rightful fee, or he'll keep ye here."

At this moment he returned with a bag of gold and silver coins, which he emptied on the table, and told her to help herself.

She took four shillings, which was her primitive fee, neither more nor less; and all his urgency could not prevail with her to take a farthing more. He looked so terrible at her refusal that she rushed out of the house.

He ran after her.

"You'll take your money with you," he roared, snatching up the bag, still half full, and flinging it after her.

It lighted on her shoulder; and partly from the blow, partly from terror, she fell to the ground; and when she came to herself it was morning, and she was lying across her own door-stone.

It is said that she never more told fortune or practiced spell. And though all that happened sixty years ago and more, Laura Silver Bell, wise folk think, is still living, and will so continue till the day of doom, among the fairies.

Low-necked Evening Dress, with Adjustable Court Train and Round Skirt.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pretty Paris evening dress is furnished with an adjustable court train, which can be looped as hereafter described, so as to form a graceful bouffant over-skirt. It can be worn over a round skirt, or joined to the front and side breadths only of the latter. In the original the waist and court train are of ardoise gray faille, trimmed with a box-pleated ruche of white ribbon two and a half inches wide, divided in the middle by a flat rose pink ribbon an inch and three-quarters wide, on which flat bows of the same color are set three inches apart. The train is edged with black lace, and draped with black lace bows. Black lace sash and shoulder knots. The round skirt is of rose pink silk, bordered with a black lace flounce, and trimmed with ruches like those of the court train. Rose pink slippers.

The pattern is furnished in nine sizes, even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches, bust measure. To take the size, pass a tape measure entirely around the body, under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust. No other measure is required. If the size is an uneven number of inches, send for the next higher number; for instance, if it is 37 inches, order 38 inches, and take the seams deeper.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises three articles—low-necked waist, adjustable court train, and round skirt.

LOW-NECKED WAIST.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, back, and short sleeve. The perforations show where to baste the seams, to take up the darts, to form the side backs, and the length of the waist. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the front. The material is extended at the bottom, to conceal the gap caused by the slipping of the skirt.

ADJUSTABLE COURT TRAIN.—This pattern is in two pieces—side piece and back breadth. Only half the pattern is given. The front edge of the side piece is laid in three small pleats, turning back, and covered with a lace bow. The side and back breadths are laid in three double box-pleats at the line of perforations in the back, about three-quarters of a yard from the bottom, and fastened with a lace bow. The back breadth is sewed to the belt with a large box-pleat in the middle, and side pleats on each side, and the side breadths are sewed on plain. The train is looped by means of three tapes, the middle one seventeen inches, and the others eleven inches long. Sew one end of each tape to the belt, one in the middle, and the others two inches on each side of it, and set buttons on the ends of the tapes. Sew a small loop at each of the perforations on the back and sides. The perforations show where to loop the skirt in the back, to lay pleats in the front side gores, and to lay the pleats in the back of the train at the bottom. A line of perforations also shows where to sew the court train to the back side gores, if it is desired to leave out the back breadths of the under-skirt. In this case the court train is not draped, but overlaps the round skirt about a quarter of a yard.

SIX-GORED ROUND SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side gores, and full breadth for the back. Only half the pattern is given. The front and side gores are sewed on the belt plain. The gore for the back is laid in small side pleats. The back breadth is gathered and sewed to the belt.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for court train, 8 yards.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for round skirt and waist, 8½ yards.

Lace for train, 6½ yards.

Lace for bows, 7 yards.

Lace for round skirt, 4 yards.

Lace for ruching of round skirt, 8 yards.

White ribbon for ruching, 50 yards.

Pink ribbon, 25 yards.

Fig. 1.—BRAIDED CORD CURTAIN BAND.—[See Page 773.]

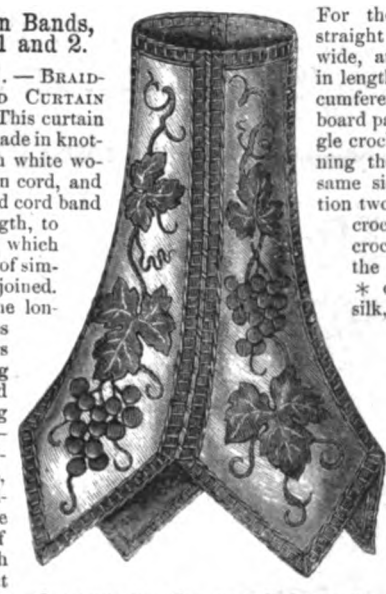
Curtain Bands, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—BRAIDED CORD CURTAIN BAND. This curtain band is made in knot-work with white woven cotton cord, and consists of a braided cord band of the requisite length, to the under edge of which long and short tabs of similar braiding are joined. The middle tab (the longest) is six inches and three-quarters long; the remaining tabs must be worked shorter, observing the illustration.—Work first the middle part of each tab, as shown by the illustration on page 773, with a piece of cord of the length required. When it is long enough, cut off the cord, fasten the ends with several stitches, and edge the tab with button-hole stitch scallops of cord (see illustration, page 773). Work the band in a similar manner, face it with colored worsted braid (the button-hole stitch scallops must project over this lining), line the tabs, and sew them to the under edge of the braided cord band on the under side, as shown by Fig. 1. Finally, trim each tab with a tassel of coarse white tatting cotton and cord, and sew on colored ribbons for tying. The band and tabs of the curtain band can also be made without the lining, and the curtain band closed with a button and cord loops.

Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED PIQUÉ CURTAIN BAND. This curtain band consists of a corded piqué band, to which tabs of the same material are joined, as shown by the illustration. The band and tabs are button-hole stitched on the outer edge, and trimmed with embroidery through the middle. Tassels of white tatting cotton are set on the lower points of the tabs. A button and button-hole close the curtain band. For the latter cut the band of piqué in one piece from Fig. 50, Supplement, button-hole stitch it all around with white cotton, work the holes indicated along the middle by means of button-hole stitches, and trim each hole with a wheel of tatting cotton. The longest tab on the middle of the curtain band is cut from Fig. 51, Supplement; this is button-hole stitched in scallops on the outer edge, excepting the upper (sloped) end, and trimmed through the middle, as indicated on the pattern and shown by the illustration, with a cross seam of coarse tatting cotton. Along the straight line indicated on Fig. 51, Supplement, hem-stitch the tab, at the same time covering the stitches of the seam. Finally, cut away the piqué underneath the seam, and set a tassel of coarse tatting cotton on the lower point of the tab. Sew the upper end of the finished tab to the under side of the band (Fig. 50) on the middle of the under side edge. The remaining tabs at both sides of the tab already sewed on are worked like the latter, but are an inch and a quarter shorter, with the upper end slightly sloped off. Sew the tabs on the band half an inch apart.

Ornamental Cap for Champagne Bottles.

FOR this pretty covering for the necks of Champagne bottles cut of gray carriage leather two pieces each from Figs. 16 and 17, Supplement, and embroider them in the given design. Cut the leaves and grapes of maroon carriage leather, paste them on the parts of the cap, and work the stems, veins, etc., in half-polka stitch with maroon twisted silk. Cut the lining of maroon carriage leather from Fig. 16, Supplement, allowing one-third of an inch extra material on the outer edge, paste them on the under side of the pieces of gray carriage leather, fold down the edges, that project equally all around, on the right side, and fasten this binding by means of long button-hole stitches and a row of half-polka stitches. Finally, join the sides of the pieces on the wrong side.



ORNAMENTAL CAP FOR CHAMPAGNE BOTTLES.

For pattern and design see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 16 and 17.

For the latter work a straight strip two inches wide, and corresponding in length to the upper circumference of the cardboard part. Work in single crochet, always beginning the rounds on the same side. Make a foundation two inches long with gray crochet cotton, and on it crochet two rounds with the same cotton. Work * one round with white silk, one with blue silk, one with white silk, two rounds with gray cotton, one round with white silk, one with blue, one with red, one with blue, one with white silk, two rounds with gray cotton; repeat from *. When the crocheted part is long enough, work the stitches of the last round and the foundation stitches together on the under side. Round off the upper edge of this part to suit the shape of the steel handle, sew it on the latter, and ornament the purse with two small leather handles.

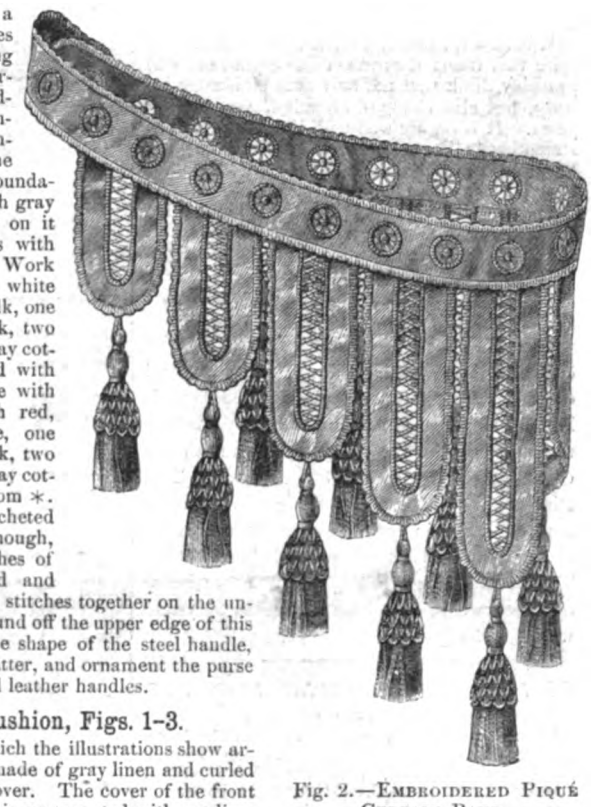


Fig. 2.—EMBROIDERED PIQUÉ CURTAIN BAND.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 50 and 51.

Embroidered Chair Cushion, Figs. 1–3.

THE three-cornered cushion, which the illustrations show arranged on two different chairs, is made of gray linen and curled hair, and furnished with a cloth cover. The cover of the front of the cushion is ornamented with application embroidery. The cover forms a lambrequin on the upper edge of the cushion (see Fig. 2). Make the cushion of the requisite size; the three-cornered side pieces are six inches and a half wide on the under edge, and sloped off toward the top at one side. Allow from eleven inches and a quarter to twelve inches extra material for the lambrequin on the piece of cloth intended for covering the front side of the cushion. Fig. 19, Supplement, gives the design for embroidering the lambrequin. Work with velvet or satin in a shade that contrasts with the foundation material, and edge the application figures with silk braid or soutache in a lighter shade. Sew colored soutache along the remaining lines of the design. Line the lambrequin with dark woolen material; join both parts on the outer edge, at the same time sewing in silk round cord. The design for the embroidery on the front side of the cushion can be executed with the assistance of the illustration, Fig. 1, and Fig. 19, Supplement. Trim the cushion with cord and tassels as shown by the illustration. The cushion on the chair, Fig. 3, is made in a similar manner; the embroidery on the lambrequin is worked in the design given by Fig. 20, Supplement.

Crochet Purse.

THE lower part of this purse is made of double card-board, covered with leather strips ornamented in point Russe; it is two inches and three-quarters long, an inch and a quarter wide, and an inch deep. The upper part, which simulates a bag of striped drilling, is crocheted. Cover two long and two short side pieces of card-board each on one side with silk, and in a similar manner cover both card-board pieces for the bottom. The leather strip for covering the card-board is an inch wide and seven inches and three-quarters long; it is ornamented in point Russe embroidery with brown saddler's silk and gold thread as shown by the illustration, and cut in small sharp points on both sides, after which it is pasted on the lower part, and fastened, besides, with long stitches of brown silk (see illustration). Sew fine brown silk cord and gold cord on this leather with short cross stitches. Paste the card-board pieces covered with silk on the inside of the lower part, at the same time fastening the crocheted part.

Footstool with Hot-water Bottle and Cover, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS footstool of brown polished wood opens so as to hold a bottle of hot water for the feet. The upper surface of the footstool is furnished with a cover, which is fastened on the lid with elastic bands an inch long; the lid is wadded and covered smoothly with brown woolen reps. The cover is made of dark brown cloth, and is embroidered in application with light brown cloth and with brown saddler's silk. Fig. 53, Supplement, gives a quarter section of the design. The cover is furnished on the under side with a lining knit of remnants of worsted, simulating fur. Instead of this, it may be quilted, or lined with fur. Along the outer edge of the cover, as well as of the lid of the footstool, set strips of brown fur an inch and a quarter wide.

Fig. 1.—FOOTSTOOL WITH HOT-WATER BOTTLE AND COVER.—OPEN.

DIARIES.

ANY body who has conscientiously tried to keep a diary, tried year after year to make a diary the beau ideal of what a diary should be, knows how extremely difficult that sort of composition is, and how slowly, year after year, it ripens toward any sort of perfection. The best way is to make them on a solid substratum of daily facts. In a well-ordered life there should be sound registration of the letters written or received, the calls made in return, the books lent or borrowed. A sensible person will not disdain to note even the stories he has told his children, or the wild flowers he has gathered in his walk. Perhaps there are notes about the books that are read or the phenomena that are observed. Any remarkable event, any conversation or chance meeting with a famous man, any curious vein of reflection, will probably be related accurately and at length. There may, probably, be more sacred and secret observations of one's heart and mind; and, if this is done honorably and fearlessly, and with the application of the elenchic process to ourselves, such a diary will be a true autobiography, and very serviceable

ELECTRO-MAGNETIC CURLING COMB!

This is the most wonderful, novel, scientific, and useful instrument ever discovered for curling straight hair in soft, luxuriant curls. One combing will curl the most stiff, stubborn hair, instantaneously, into rich, glossy curls. It does away with all hot curling irons, poisonous and dangerous curling fluids. It is perfectly reliable, never can fail, being the only sure and scientific method ever discovered to curl straight hair without the least possible injury. Only one combing required to curl the most stubborn hair into soft, luxuriant curls. To Actresses and others wishing to curl their hair in the shortest possible time, this article is invaluable, as it does not require more than three minutes' time to transform the most harsh, stiff, stubborn hair, into soft, massive tresses. The ELECTRO-MAGNETIC CURLING COMB is so constructed that it forms a perfect electro-magnet, and causes straight hair to curl by taking up or absorbing the electricity with which all straight hair is overcharged. It is well known that natural curly hair contains only about one-tenth the amount of electricity found in all straight hair. By the application of the ELECTRO-MAGNETIC CURLING COMB the electricity is instantly absorbed or taken into the comb, leaving the hair in perfectly beautiful natural curls, which will remain in curl from two to five days.

The ELECTRO-MAGNETIC CURLING COMB is simple in its construction and use: will last a lifetime, and never fails to produce the above beautiful results. It will be sent, free of postage, to any part of the United States or Canada for One Dollar and Twenty-five Cents. Address

now before the public. These instruments are preferred to all others by the most celebrated pianists. They are used by all the principal concert troupes whenever attainable. They have a truly "world-wide" reputation, being largely exported to Europe and all parts of the civilized world, and they are sought to be imitated by nearly all American and European piano-makers.

Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory

is the most perfectly arranged and extensive establishment of its kind in the world. The published official revenue returns having revealed the fact that "the amount of their yearly sales exceed those of the twelve largest piano-makers of New York combined."

STEINWAY & SONS call special attention to their

with double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, and Tubular Frame action, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other piano at present manufactured.

Every Piano Warranted for Five Years.

Prices as low as the exclusive use of the best materials and most thorough workmanship will permit. Old Pianos taken in exchange.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns,

For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 98 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 32 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 16 to 20 years of age, and for children of both sexes and all ages. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a list of two valuable premiums, both of which are offered to subscribers for Harper's Bazar. One subscriber will get at least one of these premiums, and we confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premiums offered to each and every new subscriber for the Bazar have no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land. For terms to Agents, or for catalogues, address

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work (not sewing) furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars on receipt of stamp. Address

MINCE-PIES.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

I HAVE got on so far in my preparations for Thanksgiving as to cut from the newspaper a recipe for making mince-pies. There I obey Mr. SUMNER'S injunction to Mr. STANTON, and "stick." When you read the recipe, you find, so much beef suet, and chopped stuff, and grated things, and commingling and confusion, that you lose heart at the outset. For Cinder Ella knows naught of mince-pies; and the only advantage I have over her is that I know one when I see it. I have but to sigh, "Mince-pie!" and my angel will move heaven and earth; but she will bring about some wonderful combination of fire and flour—monstrum horrendum malformum—which she will set on the table triumphantly, and will never suspect that it is not a mince-pie of the most straitest sect. I shall know that it is incomestibility and indigestibility raised to the fourth power; but I shall not know what makes it so.

No. If mince-pies are indispensable to Thanksgiving, I must go into the kitchen myself. I must study up the whole subject. I must buy the goods, and supervise all their boilings and weighings and flavorings—which things I hate. And after all my trouble I shall have on my hands a vast array of viands, which will be to me for a temptation and a torment; for vanity and vexation of spirit and body.

Yet one would not willingly so far depart from the faith of his fathers as not to have mince-pies at Thanksgiving. Remembering the shelves that of old time used to stand loaded with these portentous sweets, the jars of mince-meat that were wont to await in silence and darkness the hour that should bid them give up their juicy store to join the innumerable caravan that, with stately and majestic step, trod its eternal circle in and out of those closet doors—beginning with Thanksgiving, if circles can begin, filing slowly past Christmas, past New-Year, and reaching well into, and sometimes beyond, the depths of midwinter—who am I that I should set up a new standard, and fly in the face of Providence? Now that we have brought the nation to our way of thinking, now that we have set our New England festival firm in the affections of the whole people, shall we rob it of one of its chief accompaniments? True, mince-pie is not a characteristic of the feast. Pumpkin-pies—which the refinements of these latter days have transformed into squash—are rather the native growth of Thanksgiving, while mince-pies are the offshoots of Christmas and Merrie England. But long habit, common speech, and the Treaty of Washington have changed all that; and no Yankee housewife would feel that she had made her calling and election sure until she had garnished her larder with goodly rows of flaky and fearful pies.

Is there no way by which I can serve two masters? Can I not honor a godly ancestry without ravaging my own domestic peace and personal comfort? To meet the duties of filial piety, must I sacrifice myself on the altar of mince-piety? If I could buy half a dozen mince-pies just to celebrate with! I shall have friends enough at my board that day to share the primal curse, and we could divide and conquer. But a bake-house pie!

> "Oh, why are bakers made so coarse,
> Or palates made so fine?
> On pies that might appall a horse
> Shall man be made to dine?"
> —COWPER (with variations).

Why, when the principle of co-operation is fairly discovered, are we so slow of heart to make the most of it? It is cheaper to hire the factory to weave your calico than it is to weave it yourself. But, also, the factory calico is finer and smoother than your home-made. It must be cheaper to hire the factory to make your mince-pies than to make them yourself. But alas! the factory will not make good pies. The crust is sour and heavy and hateful; the body of the pie is tough and dry and stringy and lumpy. A miserable pretense, an exasperating hypocrisy, is the average bought pie, the restaurant pie—

> "Which none can love, which none can thank, > Creation's blot—creation's blank."

So is the "baker's loaf," a light, dry, sour shaving, good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men. If there were no such thing as a pie or a loaf to be bought, one would take courage and exhort to combined action; but every day or so the bakers' carts go jingling by to tell us that the principle of co-operation is adopted only to be abused.

> "Pancakes and fritters, > Say the bells of St. Peter's;"
> Fools and wiseacres,
> Say the bells of the bakers.

How gladly in the country would we buy all our bread, at least through the summer months! and the bread peddlers make it as feasible as the city shops—make it even more convenient, for they come to our very doors; but the bravely labeled carts bring only mockery and an inflated chip; so we build our fires and heat our houses, with the thermometer already raging up into the nineties, for bread we must have, and not a stone, even with its specific gravity left out. And so, instead of a good genius sending us sweet, light, wholesome pies to our own great relief and its reasonable profit, an ogre will continue to concoct malevolent abominations, and we must turn every peaceful home into a toiling, moiling pie-factory on a small, and, therefore, on an extravagant scale.

And yet I see a ray of light. I do not hope wholly to reconstruct the nation, but might I not insert my small wedge into the log? All my neighbors will be making delicious pies. Suppose I engage one of them to make me a certain number. They will be home-made pies, and yet they will be bought pies. When Solomonia is making her own batch she will hardly feel the exertion or the cost of half a dozen more. I will offer her baker's price, or her own if she prefer it, and possibly I may inoculate her with a love of trade, and she will be permanent pie-maker to my majesty. To be sure, I shall be the town-talk for incapacity and unthrift; but think of the "week before Thanksgiving" free from suet and the sound of the chopping-knife and the dread ordeal of raisin-stoning! Come ridicule, scorn, contumely! I will arise and go to my neighbor!

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Knowing our Places.

MY DEAR OSRIC,—If you were as old as I am, you would, perhaps, remember my aunt, who, in the days of my youth, vexed to her soul by the tricks and turbulence of the imps, as she was fond of calling her nephews, was wont to cry, sharply, as a means of restoring silence and order, "Know your place, boys; know your place!" But in a great, generous household, with such good fairies as my aunt always hovering about, what is not the place of the boys of whom the whole house is proud, and whom it loves so dearly? In a touching little paper by Mrs. Diaz, who shows in her William Henry letters how well she understands boys, and how heartily she also loves them, she speaks of the mother's longing regret for her lost boy.

The boy is gone, and there is no more disorder in the house. The furniture stands solemnly in its place, not even a chair is tipped up, nor a rug rumpled, nor a curtain torn. Nobody comes down stairs by the balusters. There is no slamming of doors. There is no bursting into the house as if Boreas had arrived and were whirling every thing before him. No more charging of squadrons of dragoons in the halls. No more gay whistling and wild shouting and the omnipresence of a tornado. Order reigns in Warsaw. Mrs. General, the Queen of Propriety, would beam approval at every turn. Order reigns in Warsaw, but it is a terrible order. It is silence, but it is the silence of death. The poor mother sits musing, and recalls that fair child's face growing into eager boyhood, and would fain hear once more the bustle and the clatter and the loud impatience; would only too gladly see the awful rents in garments, and the stubbed toes of shoes, and the hopeless untidiness of her boy. If only with the old disorder could return the old delight! The door opens quietly, and a young gentleman enters, well dressed, tranquil, courteous. His voice is musical and low, and in his whole conduct there is a thoughtful regard for every body and every thing. In the eyes of the mother and of the youth there is the tenderest light of love. But as she looks at him fondly she thinks fondly of another. With all her heart she loves the youth, but with her mother's heart also she regretfully remembers the boy. In this well-favored, well-mannered, affectionate youth she has her son; but her storming, dependent boy is gone forever.

So I say, although I had no right to diverge so far, that in a great house, and a great heart at the head of it, all places are for boys; and when my aunt said to us, "Know your place," she really did not mean to imply that whether in the cellar or in the "garret," in the parlor or in the pantry, among the dust-pans or the preserve-jars, the boys were out of place. But, although she meant no more than "Stop your noise," she conveyed her exhortation in the form of the oldest wisdom. When she shouted to us, as we ramped like Tennyson's lion on the garden gate, "Know your place!" she really said, "Know yourselves;" for only he who knows himself can possibly know his place. Alas! it is not a universal knowledge; for if it were, how would the round pins be so continually in the square holes, and the square pins in the round?

I suppose that a certain very conspicuous young friend of mine, a lawyer, thinks that he knows his place very well. It is to persuade judges and wheedle juries. It is to fill his memory with precedents, and his mind with sophistry, and his mouth with rhetoric, and then bring all to bear upon a verdict or a judgment. But as I sit among the spectators, and watch him conducting a cause, carefully dressed, curled, oiled, and perfumed, with rings upon his fingers and jewels on his bosom, and that lofty, patronizing air which is familiar to you, and then see the judges peering at him from under their heavy brows—judges, I believe, have bushy brows—I involuntarily lean forward, as if their honors were saying something. Indeed, they have a most speaking expression of countenance; and I am sometimes sure that I hear their thoughts saying—or do I only hear myself?—"Young man, know your place." And where would his place be? Plainly, in a haberdasher's shop, to tempt foolish youth with gaudy neck-ties, or to match ribbons for giddy girls.

But if I lift my mind as well as my eyes to the august bench, I reflect upon its position and its influence, and upon the generally noble history of a free magistracy. Conservative in its nature, and, like English liberty, broadening "slowly down from precedent to precedent," it has been the bulwark of that liberty, and has often really held the state against the king. What a power it is intrenched in the most reverend traditions and in the faith of man! It is easy, in any court of law, however obscure, by giving the imagination and memory play, to perceive that Hooker's famous sentence is simply true, and its rhetoric is so magnificent because its truth is so august. The judge, therefore, is in imagination, as often in fact, a grave, majestic man of ripe age, of tranquil temperament, of great knowledge, of swift insight, and, above all, of impregnable rectitude. He is the bulwark of the state. When he gives, the whole edifice yields.

So I look from my little friend at the bar to the magistrate upon the bench, and, to my confusion, he is a little friend also. To my horror, he is a prig or a dandy. And if I look so sharply and closely as to see into his career, I observe that he has not risen to the bench, nor in any honorable sense been called to it, but he has crawled to it, and he is still covered, not with the ermine of justice, but with the slime of intrigue. If I gaze steadily, I see that he makes the bench a counter, and sells justice like merchandise. He is in league with dishonest men, and if you will pay him money enough, he will betray every right that he is set to guard. He panders to popular ignorance and prejudice, that he may gain the popular vote. Sworn to administer the law made by all the people, he does the will of bad individual men. He is one of the most dangerous of all our fellow-travelers upon the great road. He is a magistrate—a judge. He thinks that he knows his place better than the rest of us. But the public honor and the public safety, if in his presence you can see them, shake at him their threatening finger and bid him know his place. Do you know what it is? It is the prison and the shame to which he dooms better men. "How sweet an Ovid was in Murray lost!" But in Jeffreys Nero is found again. And the corrupt judge is as much worse than the brutal Jeffreys as poison is more deadly than a club.

Thus, my dear Osric, if you do not know your own place, others do. We may deceive ourselves in this, but not so easily deceive others. Their eyes are not touched by the glamour of our conceit. There is Dædalus, who thinks himself born to soar upon the pinions of poetry. His place is in the empyrean. If you could read his heart, you would see that he is sure of shining among the stars. He knows his place, poor boy, and he offers you his credentials. They consist of his verses. You are very sure that their place is the fire; but you are good-natured, and you smile and praise with as little actual falsehood as you can. It is very hard to do otherwise; very hard to mortify Dædalus by telling him the truth, even supposing that he would believe it to be the truth. For if you should exhort him to know his place, he would listen with respect, and reply that it is what he wishes to do, and that he feels his place to be with Chaucer and Milton. So he publishes his book, and a few friends puff it, and a few newspapers congratulate mankind upon the advent of a new poet; and that is the end of it. We all know his place to be that of an honest clerk in some small grocery business. He thought otherwise. And are we not Dædalus? That is the question I ask myself. If you or I should be appointed interpreter to the Chinese mission, dear Osric, and it were an office of dazzling honor and of immense salary, should we not be very likely to believe that it was our place, although we are as familiar with the Chinese as with the Choctaw? And when some old aunt of a newspaper, or public opinion itself, charged us to know our place, should we not reply, "Certainly, I am in it; and let those laugh that win."

I suppose that, after all, we really know our places, my dear boy, but that we do not always like them. The man who has merely learned the Greek alphabet knows that a professorship of Greek is not his place, but he wishes the honor and the pudding. Another man, who would teach a dancing-school well, is called to edit a newspaper, and although he knows that his real strength is in his feet, not in his head, he can not resist. He does not wish to teach misses and masters to dance; he would rather teach their parents to think. I hope that you have always properly pitied the poor lady in the story who was really a white cat. She knew that her place was under the table or by the fireside, sitting gravely erect, or wiping her nose with her paws. But fate compelled her to sit, beautifully clad, at her husband's table, and talk rather than pur, and wipe her lips with a delicate napkin. She was the loveliest of wives, and he the happiest of men. But one day a mouse ran across the soft and sumptuous carpet, and in a moment my lady was on all-fours on the floor, and the mouse had disappeared. She knew her place, and in that instant taught the rest what it was.

This exposure awaits us all. When we are out of place, however fine and imposing it may be, and however fully we may seem to fill it, we are always at the mercy of the truth. In the pretty game of puss in the corner, there comes a moment when one claps his hands, and all must run for a new corner, and somebody must lose. The little fellow in the coziest corner is suddenly left alone in the middle. So, in our greater game, Truth at times claps her hands, and says suddenly to the most dignified and solemn and secure among us, "Know your place." Then it is a mere fairy tale. The judge proves to be a robber; the open saint a secret sinner; the great officer of state a bag of wind; and Cinderella in the kitchen a royal princess. "Know your place, boys," said my aunt; and stick to it, boys, whatever it is, says her nephew, and your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE WATTEAU MANTLE.

THE most novel feature of the suit of which a cut paper pattern is given this week is the Watteau mantle. This comfortable garment has three seams in the back, making it fit snugly to the figure above the belt, while below the stylish Watteau pleats are added, giving it a graceful fall over the tournure. This mantle may be made either of the material of the suit, warmly lined with flannel, or else of heavier fabric, when it will serve as a cloak with any suit. It is very handsome in tricot beaver cloth, either cypress green, deep blue, plum, or black. The colored cloth mantles are most admired when bordered with fur, usually black marten. Black cloth is appropriately trimmed with fringe headed by two or three overlapping velvet folds, or else a plain bias band of trimming velours—an ottoman repped fabric, of silk face and linen back, sold for $2 25 a yard. Soft flexible camel's-hair mantles, both gray and brown, are made by this pattern, and richly braided; black cashmere is warmly lined, and embroidered, or trimmed with passementerie and guipure lace; and Lyons velvet cloaks of this design have quilted silk lining, and are trimmed with beaded galloon, gimp, and fringe or lace.

The Watteau pleats in the over-skirt are simply folded into the belt, and draped by tapes below. The bias bands for trimming are lined with crinoline. These bands are not stitched on by machine. Each edge is turned under, the band is basted to the garment, and the stitches are taken on the wrong side, and entirely concealed.

The waist is a box-pleated blouse. Three broad pleats are preferred for woolen blouses; five pleats are used for thin linen and muslin waists, but are too bulky under the belt when the material is thick. First sew the pleats in the cloth and press them flatly, then cut by blouse pattern, and line with paper muslin. A drawing-string beneath the belt is essential to keep the waist in position. The pleats are often embroidered or covered with braiding, and sometimes a bias velvet fold is inserted, to appear beyond the edge of each pleat. A broad square collar of the material, and square cuffs on the coat sleeves, are trimmed like the pleats. Black or colored cashmere blouses and fine flannel blouses are made by this pattern, and worn with various skirts. Some very tasteful black alpaca dresses have this waist with the over-skirt and under-skirt of the House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV. With standing pleatings of clear white muslin about the neck and hands, a neck-tie and hair ribbons of becoming color, and a wide belt with massive jet buckle, an attractive toilette is arranged at small expense.

THE TOQUE.

The round hat most widely adopted this season is the Henri III. toque, with high soft crown, and slight brim turned down all around. It is worn on all occasions, and is considered as dressy as the most elaborate bonnet. It is most available when of black velvet, as it may be worn with any dress. The brim is covered smoothly with velvet, the crown is a high, irregular puff, in careless folds, and the space between the puff and brim is covered by alternate folds of velvet and faille, or by a jet band or a band of ostrich feathers. An aigrette and short feather tips, or a bird's wing, or slender cock's plumes and white heron's feathers—sometimes all of these together—stand erect on the left side, adding to the height of the hat, and giving it a sugar-loaf appearance. With this is worn a large three-cornered veil of clear net, edged with thread or duchesse lace. Colored ostrich tips are added to black velvet toques for semi-dress occasions. For colored suits trimmed with gros grain the toque is of gros grain also, with a velvet brim. Pale blue or rose-colored toques with feather tips of the same color are worn for full dress. Strings of faille ribbon are sometimes added, and the hat is transformed into a bonnet. Dull, lustreless silk, with a little jet, makes a pretty toque for mourning. These chapeaux are so simple that ladies are once more making their own bonnets, as in the days of the fanchon. To look stylish such hats must be worn quite far back, showing the entire forehead.

The mountaineer hat is in great favor this fall for children, both boys and girls, and for young misses just in their teens. This is the Tyrolean hat of two years ago, made of soft felt, with sloping crown crushed in at the top, a wide ribbon band, and game feathers for trimming. It is jaunty, and exceedingly becoming to round-faced, rosy-cheeked demoiselles.

STREET SUITS.

As the season advances, and new winter costumes appear on the street, the preference for black makes itself more visible. Ten of every dozen well-dressed ladies promenading the Avenue are arrayed in black; and the same is true of the audiences at fashionable theatres, concerts, church, and, indeed, every where that ladies most do congregate, except at the opera. Glistening jet, fine laces, jewelry, feathers, and the lavender gray gloves relieve this favorite attire from any appearance of sombreness. One elegant suit, a polonaise and single skirt, is of alternate stripes (an inch wide) of black velvet and faille. A black velvet toque, solitaire diamond ear-rings, and long lavender kid gloves were worn with this suit. Some of the richest black faille suits of the season, made by a modiste just returned from abroad, have the lower skirt escaping the ground, and trimmed to the knee in the following manner: On the edge of the skirt are three overlapping folds an inch wide, and falling over these are four bias frills, each a finger deep, two of them in scanty gathers, the intermediate ones laid in small plents. The upper skirt, with apron front and three straight back widths most bouffantly draped, is edged with three bias folds of velvet and a broad tassel fringe with netted bead heading. Passementerie ornaments loop the sides. The basque has a double postilion, a pointed front, a vest outlined by velvet folds, and duchesse sleeves. A velvet Watteau mantle is the wrap. It should be remarked here that the lingerie worn with the richest black suits in the daytime is plain linen, or perhaps embroidered linen, or else standing muslin frills in the Marie Antoinette fashion. Laces detract from the elegant simplicity of these costumes, and are reserved for home and evening toilettes.

Next to black, plum-color and dark brown suits are most often seen. Plum-colored serge, cashmere, or satine suits, with two skirts (trimmed with kilt pleating, bias bands, and fringe); a box-pleated blouse-waist, and a mantle with one or two capes, warmly lined with flannel, are in refined taste. When worn by blondes the neck-tie is pale blue; the rose-colored tie so becoming to brunettes is equally well worn with plum-color.

BALL DRESSES.

White tulle dresses are the favorite ball attire this season. These thin fabrics have regular trained skirt and tunic. The lower skirt is from sixty-five to seventy inches long behind, and about five yards wide. The foundation of this skirt is white taffeta silk, and the tulle garniture covers it completely. Two such dresses, prepared for the Duke's ball at the Academy of Music, are worthy of description. The first, made for a Russian lady of distinction, has a wide-fringed silk flounce underneath each of the pleated tulle flounces; a silk ruche covered with tulle is the heading for each flounce. The tulle over-skirt is caught up with sprays of acacia blossoms, and the bertha is tulle folds and a fringe of acacias. The second, similarly made, is entirely without flowers, and is draped with many small bows of white faille simply fringed on the edges. The sash is not ribbon, but is three-quarters of a width of silk, the edges fringed slightly, and draped to fall on each side. Some beautiful French dresses, imported for balls, are of tulle, faille, and crape combined. The short skirt, usually white, is formed of alternate ruffles of pleated tulle and scantily gathered crape. The train, similar to that illustrated in last week's Bazar, is of faille, bordered with ruffles of the same, trimmed with crape and tulle folds. Sèvres blue, pale rose, and flesh-colored trains are shown. The low round corsage is of faille, with a pleated tulle bertha.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN, SCHMAUDER, and VIEFOLET.

PERSONAL.

OUR friend PAUL DU CHAILLU has just returned from a seven months' tour through Sweden, Norway, and the regions of the midnight sun in capital health and spirits, and with a note-book full of memories of reindeers and walruses, which he will discourse of to the lecture-going public this winter, and condense into a book for the amusement of the young folks some future Christmas. Meanwhile HARPER & BROTHERS have just published his "Land of the Dwarfs," being the fourth of the series of wonder-books with which it is his custom to delight the hearts of children every year.

—General FRANCIS A. WALKER, of Massachusetts, the newly appointed Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is a man of decided ability. During the war he won his brevet as a general. Afterward he took to teaching, and subsequently joined the editorial staff of the Springfield Republican. He is spoken of as the kind of man who will never be inveigled into any jobbery or questionable proceeding connected with the public service.

—RUSKIN has given to the University of Oxford the sum of $25,000 as an endowment for the master of a school of art.

—General J MEREDITH READ, United States consul-general at Paris, is the happy possessor of a breastpin which once lay dormant on the manly shirt-bosom of GEORGE WASHINGTON. From G. W. it fell to General JACKSON. A. J. gave it to JOSEPH BONAPARTE. J. B. gave it to Count DE GIRARDIN. The count's son, to whom it descended, sent it to General READ as a souvenir of the siege of Paris.

—Judge RICHARDSON, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, is about to return to Washington, having nearly closed up the business of the syndicate in London which he went out to attend to.

—The new Mrs. HOME, who is coming home with Mr HOME, is said to be descended from a princely house, a petite brunette, with little hands and feet, high-arched instep, and nice manner. She is, moreover, strong in the three per cents, which generally makes home happy.

—Probably the oldest editress in continuous service in the United States is Mrs. SARAH J. HALE, of Godey's Lady's Book. She has touched eighty-four, and labors constantly at the work in which she has been engaged for four-and-forty years.

—DISRAELI has been elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, a position that has been held by EDMUND BURKE, Sir ROBERT PEEL, Lord MACAULAY, Lord EGLINTOUN, Sir ARCHIBALD ALISON, Lord PALMERSTON, the Duke of Argyle, and Lord LYTTON. It is held only for two years, and is a place that, for the historical honor and splendid reminiscences connected with it, is aimed at by the most eminent statesmen and scholars of Great Britain. The Lord Rector has to deliver an address, and nothing more, during his term. These addresses are proverbially good, and we may, therefore look for something very fine from the ex-premier.

—When ALEXIS was shown into the very, very grand bedroom which the Committee on Grand Duke had provided for him, and saw the superb arrangement that had been contrived for him to sleep in, all so nicely fixed up with silk and satin, he concluded that he could not stand that; so sent aboard the man-of-war, and had brought to him his simple, regular, naval, brass-framed bed, about the size of a hospital bed, and into that his imperial highness inserted himself when it became time for his imperial highness to take off his coat and things and go to bed. The committee bed was too much for him. Did any body ever really sleep in one of these things?

—On the 1st day of October last the Rev. HENRY BOEHM, the oldest living minister of the M. E. Church, officiated at the laying of the corner-stone of the Third M. E. church in Lancaster, Pennsylvania. Sixty-eight years before, he preached the first Methodist sermon ever delivered in that city, and organized the first society, consisting of six persons.

—Kaiser WILLIAM has conferred upon Miss BRIEL, of Richmond, Virginia, who was in Europe during the war, a splendid cross of honor, in recognition of the services rendered by her to the sick and wounded soldiers.

—The Speaker of the American House of Representatives receives a salary double that of a member of the House. The Speaker of the British House of Commons does much better than this. Parliament gives him a magnificent residence, furnished and kept in repair at the public expense, and containing one hundred rooms. He receives a salary of $25,000, and on retirement is created a viscount and has a pension of $20,000, which, on his death, passes to his son.

—ALEXANDRE MAME, the junior partner of the famous French publishing house of MAME & CO., was elected to the National Assembly over EUGENE ROUHER, the ex-minister of NAPOLEON III.

—Mr. DARWIN will be rejoiced to learn that a New Zealand monkey has been discovered nursing a human infant.

—Old STEPHEN GIRARD made this observation, which may be pondered by young merchants: "During my long commercial experience I have noticed that no advantages result from telling one's business to others, except to create jealousy or competition when we are fortunate, and to gratify our enemies when otherwise." He was never known to disregard this theory.

—Captain BURTON, the African traveler, is again in England, after several years' absence—this time in South America. He is fresh as a daisy. The lithe, muscular, fleshless form, the thin, dark face, with the gleaming eyes, and the whole bearing of the man—sardonic, defiant, reckless—are exactly in keeping with the character which his books and his adventures paint for him. He has latterly been in rarely visited regions, and is about to print very wonderful things.

—Mr. ROBERT T. LINCOLN, only son of the late President, writes from Chicago to a gentleman in this city that the lawyers of that place are entirely without books, the library of the Law Institute and many large private law libraries having been consumed by the fire. Mr. LINCOLN calls on his brethren of the bar of New York to come to their assistance.

—Dr. WILLARD PARKER, one of the foremost of our physicians, makes the astounding statement that one-third of all the deaths in New York city are the result, directly or indirectly, of the use of alcohol, and that in the last thirty-eight years 190,000 persons in this city have died of its use, either by themselves or their parents.

—SPIELHAGEN, the German romancist, will come to the United States next spring, and lecture on Shakspeare.

—A son of Count ORLOFF is said to be the ablest engineer in the Russian army—only twenty-six at that—and already a colonel.

—HIRAM POWERS has been sojourning with his family for a brief season at Scarborough, England. He goes immediately back to Florence to resume his old "trade."

—Dr. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES lives in a mansion chock-full of delightful memories. It came into the possession of Judge OLIVER WENDELL in 1807, who left it, at his death in 1818, to his daughter, Mrs. HOLMES, for whose use he had purchased it. Some of the rooms are filled with ancient tables and chairs; but the square box of an apartment used by the poet's father seems as solemn as were the discourses of the pastor, while the extreme simplicity of other rooms, full of nooks and corners, and withal quaint and canny, is suggestive of a more than Puritan plainness. A few days after the battle of Lexington General ARTEMUS WARD selected this house for his head-quarters, and here was planned the occupation of Bunker Hill and the raid on the islands of Boston harbor. WARD gave a banquet to WASHINGTON in the long dining-room fronting on the east side of the Common. Patriotic songs were sung. Here, too, General WARREN rested on his way to that battle in which he sacrificed his life, and whose remains now sleep in the Granary burying ground in Boston. The HOLMES estate has been recently purchased by Harvard College, and there is some talk of demolishing the old mansion to make room for a structure for college purposes.

—Mr. ISAAC W. ENGLAND, of the Sun, has been appointed a School Commissioner of this city, in place of ISAAC BELL. Mr. ENGLAND has not only the industry and ability, but has had a training in public affairs that admirably qualifies him for the duties of the place.

—The Countess BERTINATTI, who has been in this country for some months past, has returned to the Hague, where her husband is Italian minister. The countess was well known in society here some years ago as Mrs. BASS, a very beautiful and accomplished woman, whose husband, a Southern planter, died and left her a large fortune.

—In the "Life and Letters of Miss Sedgwick," just published by the HARPERS, and one of the most charming books of its class ever issued in this country, is the following "personal," which will be read with special interest and pleasure by those who used to attend the "Old Park" Theatre forty years ago:

"January 14, 1831.

"I have been twice, dear KATE, to see your beau ideal, the miraculous boy (Master BURKE)! He is the only prodigy I ever saw. He is endowed with faculties that would make him pre-eminent at any age, that are prodigious at his. He plays tragedy with great propriety, but he is too young for the lover and Romeo—a beautiful Cupid wooing an overgrown Juliet of a certain age. He is a true son of the comic muse, and either in Looney M'Twolter, a wild Irish boy, or in Sir Abel Handy, a simple, kind-hearted, hen-pecked, wild projector of impracticable improvements, or in the Protean boy in the 'March of Intellect' (a farce written for him), he is incomparable. But what would delight you are his musical attainments. He is said by competent judges to play the violin better than SIGNORA. This would be a wonderful acquisition if he had no other; and the best of it is, that, when he is commended for it, he says, with great modesty, 'That any body might play as well who would practice as much.' To me it is very interesting to see the intense interest with which the orchestra listen to him, and to hear their leader cry, with all his heart, 'Bravo!' Indeed, the actors seem often to forget every thing but his presence and powers. My dear child, I would not turn your head with this dramatic genius, but I think we owe, and we can not help paying, a tribute of admiration to such beautiful gifts of Heaven, and it may stimulate your own efforts to know what acquisitions may be made by intense assiduity. His brief life must have been a continued study. But there is a sad reverse to this picture; and when I see him come on in his own character, in his jacket and trowsers, and square collar and frill, his fair, shining hair brushed smoothly down, and feel that his youth and innocence are in a tainted atmosphere, that he is exposed to moral death, that his fine powers are almost sure to be blasted by such unnatural excitement and overdoing, that the rich bud must perish, I could weep—to tell the truth, I have wept over him."

In a foot-note Miss SEDGWICK says:

"It is pleasant to say that this melancholy prophecy was never fulfilled, and that 'Master BURKE,' passing the fiery ordeal of precocity and publicity safe in simple honesty of nature, is now living in New York, sincerely esteemed by all who know him, both as a man and a musician."

LAMBREQUINS FOR BRACKETS, WASTE-PAPER BASKETS, ETC.

Lambrequins for Brackets, Waste-paper Baskets, etc., Figs. 1-3.

THE lambrequin, Fig. 1, is worked on cloth with a braiding of silk soutache, or else with black woolen soutache on wash materials, such as piqué or drilling. In the latter case button-hole stitch the outer edge before sewing on the soutache. For working on cloth, the color of the soutache should either form a lively contrast with the material, or be one tone lighter than the foundation.

The lambrequin, Fig. 2, which is pinked in scallops on the outer edge, is worked on crimson cloth in the Turkish style, with an application figure of black velvet, and chain stitch, cord, satin stitch, and point Russe embroidery. In choosing the colors it is to be observed that bright blue and corn-color or gold must be used lavishly.

The lambrequin, Fig. 3, is made of claret cloth, ornamented with a grape leaf in application of gray cloth in two shades. The outer edge of this leaf is edged with narrow gold braid, which is sewed on with black silk. The remainder of the trimming is worked, as shown by the illustration, in point Russe, chain stitch, and herring-bone stitch, with gray or maroon saddler's silk and coarse twisted gold thread, which is sewed on with black silk. After finishing the work cut away the material along the chain stitch row, which forms the outer edge.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

PARIS is resuming its normal activity, and this not with feverish haste, but slowly and surely. In the course of December the laggards will all have returned, and the season will be fairly inaugurated with the New-Year. The coming winter will be an interesting one in Paris; for there will be witnessed a kind of tournament, the prize of which is a crown. All the Faubourg St. Germain, the land of the Legitimists, who have lived so long in obscurity, waiting for their time to come, will revive, give fêtes, collect its forces, and watch its chance. The Orleanists will have their rallying points at the homes of the sons of Louis Philippe, and even the Bonapartists will not be silent: already they are scattering potatoes through the country and pamphlets through the towns, to prove that they alone are the friends of the peasants, the army, and the people, and that they are ready to fraternize with every one, even with the Commune and International. In a word, all are paying court to the sovereign people, to obtain of them a complete abdication in favor of Henri V., Louis Philippe II., or even of Napoleon IV., however improbable the success of the latter may seem.

The fashions are as uncertain and composite as the political situation, attempting to fuse the most opposite styles. Suits are still worn with the under-skirt touching the ground, without, however, abandoning trained skirts; only these are confined exclusively to dinner and evening dresses. Over-skirts are worn with trained dresses, unless the latter are richly trimmed with embroidery, in which case basques with very long skirts take the place of over-skirts. The embroidery is worked with silk on silk, silk and wool, or all-wool fabrics; or with soutache on all kinds of material, including velvet. Embroidery is in high favor, and is seen on morning dresses as well as on trained and bridal costumes.

As to dresses for the morning, matinées, and all occasions before dinner, the prettiest are made of cashmere or drap de France. The combination that is at once the most simple and elegant is a skirt trimmed with three bands cut in small points on the under edge, and edged with a satin piping of the same shade; above each band is a satin piping. The over-skirt is rather long, and is cut in points on the under edge like the bands, and edged with a satin piping in the same manner. The waist is made with long basques, which are pleated in the back, as the over-skirt is not draped behind, but only on each side, under the arms.

The woolen stuffs most worn are light cloth in all shades, double cashmere and vigogne; and in mixed fabrics, Irish poplin. For suits, velveteen is worn more than velvet; it is much less expensive, and produces the same effect. The coarse soutache that is used for embroidering woolen garments is made of the same thread that is employed for alpaca; it is consequently glossy, and more suitable than silk for embroidering woolen.

Mixed toilettes are composed with a silk or velvet skirt and poplin or wool over-skirt and waist. Neutral tints are most in vogue for all dresses worn in the daytime—black, brown, pain-brûlé, hanneton, gray, Havana brown, Turkish tobacco, etc. Such a thing as a blue or green dress, or of any decided color, is unheard of; and if by chance one is met in the street, the wearer is set down at once as a country-woman, who does not know how to dress. All bronze shades are very much in fashion.

Costumes designed for ceremonious visits are composed of a faye skirt with mixed velvet trimmings of the same color, and a large, bouffant polonaise or redingote of the same velvet, edged with a band of fur. This season no kind of fur is banned by fashion, not even chinchilla, which has been so long abandoned, and which makes such pretty trimmings for brown, dark green, black, and dark gray. The whole suit—skirt and over-skirt—is also made of silk, bordered with a wide band of velvet, and for the street a small half-fitting jacket is added, of velvet like the trimming. Persons in delicate health and afraid of cold wear, over velvet polonaises or redingotes, a kind of carrick, or coachman's cape, of the same velvet, composed of three capes, ranged one above the other and wadded, and covering the bust from the neck to the waist. This carrick is separate from the polonaise, and can be worn or thrown off at pleasure.

Hoop skirts no longer exist entire; they are cut in two perpendicularly, the front is suppressed, and the back is worn on a belt. They are either furnished with steel springs, or made of stiff muslin flounced from the top to the bottom.

Round hats are not worn at all in the winter, except by children and misses under fifteen; but the bonnets are as round and as high as the round hats. They are trimmed with lace ruches, feathers, rosettes, and ribbons, and are made of dark velvet of the same shade as the trimmings, black, brown, or gray felt, or lace and velvet. Almost all, even for full dress, are of dark colors, and the elegance consists chiefly in having the bonnet exactly match the color of the dress with which it is worn.

For the opera and theatre young married ladies and young girls may wear princesse over dresses of white muslin, with high or heart-shaped waists and full sleeves, simply hemmed on the bottom, or scalloped and edged with narrow lace. These are always worn over high or heart-shaped silk dresses. The full sleeves are trimmed with bows of ribbon to match the bayadère sash, almost as wide as a scarf, which is tied round the waist at the side or behind at pleasure. These over dresses are worn over plain foulard as well as silk, of gray, light green, blue, pale pink, or lilac tints. For full evening dress neutral shades will be worn in preference to decided colors, which are considered less stylish.

Little change has been made in the mode of dressing the hair. Certain young girls have abandoned the chignon, and wear their hair in braids rolled around the head and fastened with large Italian pins of gilt or silvered metal or jet. This coiffure is only intended for the house or evening, as the pins could not find room under the present bonnets, which are not even intended to lodge an entire head, much less any additional ornament.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

A SIBERIAN BREAKFAST-TABLE.

THE object which most interested me at that moment (my appetite having been considerably sharpened by the fresh morning air) was the well-spread table that stood at the farther end of the room, crowned with a steaming tea-urn, around which clustered a multitude of good things that had quite an air of luxury in the heart of this desolate region. Propped against the urn stood an enormous loaf of rye bread, looking like a brown hassock set on end, and beside it a huge earthenware jar brimming with rich, fragrant honey. On one side of the table figured a gigantic bear-ham, the very sight of which carried me back to the shadowy forests and snug little hamlets of Norway and Finland; on the other, an immense smoked fish, looking in its present condition very much like frozen leather, but in reality, as I knew by experience, "much better than it was bonnie;" while the corpulent tea-pot, enthroned above them all on the "perch" of the urn, puffed out its round cheeks and turned up its short thick nose in the air, as if snuffing the good cheer. All this abundance harmonized admirably with the appearance of the buxom, jolly-looking matron who here played the part of "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table." In the whole village there was no better housekeeper or kinder hostess than Tatiana Grigòrievna Semionnoff; and as she now came forward to greet me, with a hospitable smile on her healthy sunburnt face, and her strong compact figure set off by a simple gray dress trimmed with fur, she might have passed for the incarnation of some well-fed national saint, with the steam of the tea-urn curling round her head in a kind of glory. Her lovely daughter, with her large brown eyes dancing with mischievous mirth, pearly teeth displayed by her roguish smile, and glossy locks that rippled over her shoulders, would have charmed any artist from the Caspian to the Atlantic. She was dressed in a dark frock of coarse thick cloth, fastened at the waist by one of those gaudy crimson scarfs in which all Russians delight; and her only ornaments were a scarlet ribbon passed through her hair, and the small silver cross that hung round her neck. We sat down to our morning meal—as merry a party, I'll answer for it, as were gathered that day between the Obi and the Amoor.

family circle from the neighbors'—though we all knew he was Johnny Guptill, we knew no more, knew nothing but that he was cleanly clad and happy. To our inquiry as to where he lived, he said, "Oh, down along. Sing, Loro; sing 'Johnny comes marching home!'"—quite astute enough not to be discovered in these raids of his on a strange household. We learned, though, after a while, that he lived not far away, and was the son of a worthy man who drove one of the city teams—a string of four magnificent black horses, as much objects of Johnny's pride as though his father owned them.

"I suppose your mother thinks the world of you," I said, one day. The vibratory motion of Johnny's head answered as plainly as words, "I'll bet she does!" but he vouchsafed nothing further.

"And what does your father do?" piped dear old grandma from her corner, in the same connection.

"Drives a team!" said Johnny, nowise sentimental, and intent on scratching Loro's head, while squeezing the patient cat which he held by the heels in his left arm.

"Are you the baby?" I asked, presently.

That fired Johnny. A baby, indeed! You might as well have called him a girl!

"Baby!" said he, with a broad laugh. "I'm 'most a man. We've got no baby."

"Dear me!" I said. "What a dismal house—a house without a baby!"

"We're going to have one," answered Johnny, stoutly, and more he would not.

One night, Johnny having delayed so long racing with Dash and the other dogs that the evening was already purple, I felt obliged to go home with him, nobody else being handy; and holding my fingers tightly, he led me to a neat little house, with a wide entry-way running through it into a little garden that, in the fall, would be thick with peaches and pears and grapes.

"Oh," I said, "that is where you get your cheeks."

"No I don't," said Johnny. "I got 'em in heaven."

A woman came to the door—a pretty, fair-faced woman, wrapped in a shawl, though it was such pleasant weather: at least she would have been pretty if she had not been so downcast. She might have had one of those apple-blossom faces originally, I thought; and there were Johnny's beautiful wide-open eyes in it; but its lines were drawn and haggard, though she could hardly have been twenty-five years old; and her hair was combed back plainly and twisted, as if she had no heart in any thing. She gave me a lugubrious stare, and took Johnny's arm without a word, led him into one of the rooms, and shut the door.

It was not a warm reception; but my arms were full of Johnny's treasures, cherished sticks and stones and strings, and I lingered a moment to deposit them inside the entry. As I did so a man stepped from a back-room, a towel in his hand, with which he was polishing off his head and neck—a man as upright as a pine-tree, with a dark, noble face, on which a worried look came and went, as if some sore trouble contended with natural buoyancy.

"Thank you a thousand times, ma'am," said he, in Johnny's own cordial way, "for bringing home my boy. I was just coming for him, for I knew pretty well from his talk where he must be. He thinks an awful sight of your Poll and the dogs, and of all of you, ma'am." And he gave me his wet hand. "You mustn't mind my poor woman," he said. "She's strange—she's a little strange; at times she's apt to be. She'll be all right by-and-by, and thank you as much as I do for letting that little rogue amuse himself at your house so much."

It was not long after that Johnny, standing with his nose blue and flat as an oyster against the pane of an unopened window, cried out, as if he had discovered a planet, "There's my father!" and I saw Mr. Guptill's team in the street by our gate, on some road-making business of the city's.

"How is your wife now?" I asked him, as he looked up and grinned at Johnny.

"Oh!" he answered, the troubled look shutting down over his face again, "she's strange still; she's a little out. She's got fancies, ma'am; yesterday she thought she was in a settlement on the Great Salt Desert, and must get back to people. And to-day she thinks she's in prison. It's hard, ma'am," he said, resting on the long shovel with which he scattered the stones in the road, handsome and stately as any old knight leaning on his spear; "it's hard just now," he added, as if regretting any thing so much like complaint. "It won't be long, the doctor says. She'll be all right by Christmas. But it makes a gloomy house, and a sad home for Johnny. You're good to him, ma'am; you're—" But here Mr. Guptill abruptly turned away, without another word, and I presently heard him relieve his feelings by swearing at his horses like a pirate, though he snapped his whip in the air all the same.

Later that day, in my afternoon walk, I saw Johnny trudging along behind a drove of cows, having begged the deputyship from the proper herdsboy, who followed leisurely on the sidewalk as the tiny drover urged the great beasts before him—so bright and busy, so rosy and dimpled, half wrapped, too, in the cloud of dust through which he scuffled along, that I could only think of the little god Mercury when he stole the oxen of Apollo. At the head of his street, though, I contrived to separate him from this proud task, and carry him home to his mother, for I thought, though I might be of no other benefit to her, I might help her as one woman's sympathy helps another, and Johnny was good middle ground. So I walked in with my prize, and, saluting her by name, spoke brightly to take her unawares, which temporarily conquered the hysteria, and let me see her real nature in the moment she forgot herself.

It was a dreary room enough that she sat in—sweeping, dusting, scouring, were forgotten arts there, you would have said. Nevertheless, it looked as though once it had been kept trim as a flower bed, for there were pretty home-made brackets on the walls, and some little pictures cut from books and framed in rude passe-partout, and a wreath of last year's autumn leaves above the speckled glass; in the window hung all the withered tracery still of a dead ivy that at some time had been trained with care; while on the upper shelves of an open closet I could see the best dishes ranged artistically, only those of every-day use were dumped in unwashed heaps upon the lower shelves, and cobwebs strung themselves along the whole.

Mrs. Guptill herself sat on a low chair by the empty fire-place, unkempt, unclean, trotting one foot up and down in an endless journey, the old shawl on her shoulders, the despairing look on her face.

"Here's this darling little Johnny of yours," I said: "I found him driving home such a herd of cows, in such a whirlwind of dust! Oh, Johnny Guptill, nobody'd have to look at you twice to see what you are made of!"

"He is a little darling!" she said, looking up at me as pleased as possible, the color on her cheek, and her eyes lighted up for an instant. "Oh, my goodness! what a face!" she laughed. "Go wash it, you little pig!" And then she caught him in her arms, and kissed him till she all but smothered him, Johnny spasmodically returning the hugs, and alternating them with struggles to get away.

"Oh, what cheeks!" said the mother.

"Whether they are made of dust or made of peaches, there never were any sweeter," said I, as Johnny ran and held them up to me.

"Oh, husband says you're so good to him!" she exclaimed. "I suppose it's you. And I'm—I'm so bad!" And suddenly she burst into a flood of tears, and cried out, conscious, as hysterical people are wont to be, "Oh, all my trouble is back on me!"

"My dear," said I, "you haven't any trouble. Don't speak so: you are only tired. Just think of what a happy woman you are, with such a husband and with Johnny."

"Don't talk to me!" she exclaimed—"don't talk to me about Johnny! I get up in the night—I look at him; I think what must happen to him in this world: it's dust and ashes—oh, it's dust and ashes! and I should put him out of it—oh, I should put him out of it—if John didn't catch me back, and hold me fast till I shut my eyes and pretend to be asleep. But I never am asleep. I can't sleep! I hear the keys rattle in the night—all night those jailer's keys—"

"Poor John!" I said. "He must be very sorry for you. It's hard for him too—it makes one so low-spirited to come home to a sick person, with no one to clear up or brighten any thing."

"I know it," said she, drearily. "I'm afraid he'll take to drink. I can't help it."

"Suppose you let me stir round and put things to rights," I suggested, "and get him a good hot supper?"

"He gets his own supper!" said she, suddenly—her mood inexplicably changing—folding her arms, and with a wicked sort of determination in her voice.

"He must be almost as tired as you are," I urged, "when he gets home from driving those four huge horses"—for I fancied the horses might possibly be as much objects of pride with her as with Johnny.

"Yes, they are splendid animals," she replied, a little softened. "And John does drive them as if he knew a charm. But there!" and she was on the point of relapsing.

"Come," I said, "let me help you a little. I should like to get something nice to eat for dear little Johnny, and you're so tired. Shall I?"

"I'm sure," responded Mrs. Guptill, "I don't care what you do. It's no house of mine, for you to ask me. It's a jail. One's as good right as another. I suppose you paid your taxes?" with a suspicion that, after all, it might be an almshouse.

And, with this sort of permission, I took off my bonnet, pinned up my gown, and flew around there for an hour as I should have thought I was killed to do at home. In that time, though, with Johnny's little blundering, bothering help—for the rogue really seemed to understand something of what it meant, and left his fly-catching in order to trip me up, and be under my heels like a kitten—I had the room reduced to comparative order and superficial neatness, a table cleanly spread, and two or three smoking dishes ready for Mr. Guptill's return. I talked to her cheerily all the time I moved about, but she was muttering to herself. Once I heard her say, as if still dwelling on the thought, "A jail—a dungeon! But I'm not going to stay in it long, I can tell you that much! Not any longer than it takes me to break out of it!" By-and-by, as I passed, she was whispering, "If I could just remember where mother is!"—her mother had been dead a dozen years, I learned. And at last she looked up at me with the wildest and most puzzled face. "I tell you," she said, "something's going to happen to me! I've told John, and he laughs! He don't care; he laughs! But it hangs over me like a cloud. I walk with my head in it." And she hid her face in her shawl again.

"Why, it's your baby, dear," said I. "You're a little nervous now, that's all; but you'll soon be over it, you know. I wonder—"

She turned and surveyed me with a superb sort of scorn in her flashing eyes. "Well, you are a touch above!" she said. "Do you suppose I shouldn't know as much about that as any body else? There's nothing of the sort coming here, unless it comes in a basket tied to the door-bell!" And I saw the poor thing had no real idea of her situation whatever.

I brought her a cup of tea and some toast, and by constant urging had her eat it all. She paused in drinking the last of the tea. "He says you're dreadful good to Johnny," she murmured. "I don't know what you're so good to me for, unless"—and here a new idea seemed to strike her with force, furious force—"unless you're looking after John when I'm gone. Now you just go along yourself! He sha'n't find you here. You're a great sight too good for him. And you can't have my John, for all your goodness!" And nothing would pacify her, in spite of my fifty years and gray curls, till I took my bonnet and left the place.

I did not feel, though, as if it were right to be daunted by the vagaries of a flighty woman, and in such a case as this; and in a few days I went down there again, carrying some jelly, with little eggs of blanc-mange in it, for an excuse. But she must have seen me coming; for I heard the bolt slip snappishly just as I mounted the door-step, and so came back with my trouble for my pains.

But, for all that, I now and then, as the days went by, sent down little messes by Johnny, who always brought the bowls back nicely washed, though I've no doubt his father washed them—and Johnny's face besides. "We don't have dinner down home now," the child whispered once to me; "my mother, she won't make dinner any more." And then, in a queer sort of innocent pride, as if repentant of his confession, and determined at any rate not to profit by it, though I don't know where such a baby could have come by it, he refused to touch doughnuts or chicken wings; and I could only get him to drink a glass of milk by taking every other sip with him; and nothing any of us could do was of avail to make him use the long-deserted high chair at our table. Johnny's dear cheeks were not so chubby in a month's time as they had been, though I think the balance is cast in their favor again by this time.

One bright, blue, red-leaved day—it was toward the last of October—Mr. Guptill came up for the delaying Johnny, walking with hanging head and a totally dispirited air. "My poor woman's gone," said he to me.

"What?" I cried, horrified. "Gone?" supposing he meant she was dead.

"She's gone; she's run away," he answered. "She's left a letter saying so, saying she couldn't stay. I don't know where she's gone—down the railroad or across the fields. She's no friends to go to, you know. I've set the police to work; I've got criers out; I've searched the wharves; but she's not been there. My heart misdoubts me. A poor, crazy thing out in the world alone!" and the hand, flinging off tears, trembled like a leaf.

"But crazy people are very cunning, you remember," said I at last; "perhaps she is the safest so."

"I thought of that," he said. "Yes, I thought of that. For when I got home and found her gone, and that letter saying so, dreary as the place was to me," he said, with a shaking voice, "I see it has been as pleasant as a palace with her in it to what it is without her; and—and I just sat down and gave up. You see, it made the whole creation black." And if the man broke down entirely then, I don't know the man that wouldn't. "However," said he, presently, "you must excuse my making a fool of myself."

"But what will you do yourself?" I asked.

"I'll do what I can. I'll take Johnny on the team with me. I let her have him, thinking 'twould do her good. The worst of it is," he cried, suddenly, "that I can't look after her! If she's not found in some brook, or hurt by tramps, or lying starved in the fields, I'm seeing her wake up with her baby beside her, and the spell still on her, and making away with it; and then—oh, good God!—they'll be having my Anne up for murder!"

"Oh no, no," said I. "You must remember there is a special providence for such cases."

"I don't believe it, ma'am," said he. "I've heard of them; but they ain't true."

"Well, at all events," I answered him, "you know that God, who took care of her under your roof, can take just as good care of her under the roof of this Indian-summer sky, or wherever she may be."

But he only wrung my hand, and walked away with Johnny.

The next day the advertisements for the lost woman were out, the police were on the alert, the posters were broadcast on every fence for forty miles, you might say; for I added some means of my own to the slender and almost exhausted ones of Mr. Guptill. But nothing came of it, and the poor man, growing every day more gaunt and wretched, was at last fairly desperate. And no wonder, when you think of what a life he led, tied to his task by day, but tormented by all sorts of horrible suspicions, and with those desolate rooms to take his child home to at night. Johnny cried for his mother when going to bed, but by day he was too busy with the team and its four great horses to miss any thing, far too busy to remember Loro and the dogs; and I should not have seen him at all if, taking advantage of my years and my married sons, I had not run down several evenings and made the bed, and dusted the rooms, and spread the table with a basket of nourishing food Nancy or my girls had put up for me to take. But, after all, what was I, a miserable old woman, in his house for half an hour, and the light and life of that house, his love, his Johnny's mother, gone out of it to die by the road-side! He sat still, and cursed himself for his powerlessness to do more.

So the long November days crept by; the long, lonesome evenings; the wild nights, when the winds were up and away like a wail of lost spirits; when the whole year was darkest and dreariest, and at its lowest ebb; when he sat beside his fire, his heart bursting; when he lay awake and longed and listened till it seemed to him, with the beating and rustling of his breast, that her head must be beside him there on the pillow. Sometimes then, I know, he rose and left Johnny in the dark up stairs, and locked the door behind him, and roamed all night along the moon-lit highways and by-ways, half distracted, to find what it was impossible he should, coming back, like a worn ghost of himself, by daybreak, to his crying child and weary work. Ah, it was a bitter month to the man!

And his father's grief and pain infected Johnny. When the horses had become something of an old story, and he returned to his former love, teasing Loro to sing again, he was strangely still and silent, and more than once I saw the slow tears coursing down his cheeks.

"'Taint like this down home," said Johnny, as he saw the girls hanging round my chair while I stoned the raisins and sliced the citron one day. "There ain't any mother there." A bunch of raisins, stuffed into his pocket by sheer force, reconciled him soon to life, though. But it was only an hour afterward that, Dash having hurt his feelings by tumbling him too roughly in his play, I saw the little lad pick himself up and walk away to a seat, and, after sitting there with a swelling sense of wrong, put up his little lip, and cry out all at once, "I want—I want my mother!" Poor little lad, I did the best I could for him with my full hands, as his warm overcoat and ear-lappets tell to-day; but, after all, the best was nothing, and my love was not mother's love.

Well—it was the night before Thanksgiving: the coldest night, it seems to me, that I ever knew. Some local cold snap, I fancy, as I did not hear of any unusual weather elsewhere. But the windows were thick with frost, though a raging fire filled the furnaces; and when the overcast night came with a pall of star-hiding cloud, it felt as if the very air, still and cold as death itself, were frozen. There seemed to be something supernatural abroad that night, I remember—perhaps because of the absence of snow—for the hard, bare earth, the black weather, the awful cold, were all a horror.

We were going to roast a little turkey for Johnny, to be taken to the house hot, with its vegetables, on the next day; but I thought I would run down a moment with a basket of other goodies—a cold fowl and a pudding; and against every body's remonstrances I bundled and veiled myself, and went along with basket and lantern as fast as my old feet would travel. I felt as if that heart-broken man, on such a night as that, must know he had friends and sympathy.

He had a good fire when I went in, half crying with the cold myself, and his room was really as bright as a new cent; for, he said, he thought it wasn't the fair thing by Johnny to let him see nothing but trouble; and he was cutting jack-straws for the child, who sat up at the table, receiving each new one with plaudits. But every few moments the man rose nervously and went to the window, and scraped a place to look out; he wouldn't have the curtain dropped; he had burned a lamp in that room all night every night for more than a month, and more than once he went to the door and looked out there, letting in a perishing blast of air. "Oh, poor girl! my poor Anne!" he would say to himself, with a sigh that was a groan, coming back.

But I was sure that, whatever the truth might be, he must be sustained by encouragement till he had gotten used to it, and so I took a parcel from under my shawl and opened it on the table.

It was my little Tom's wardrobe, pre-served with care this ten years, but whitened and darned freshly, and no doubt a much better outfit now than that with which Johnny began the world. "See," said I, spreading out the things with their pretty new ribbons and worsteds, "I have brought these down; for of course she had nothing made, and when she comes home she will hardly have any thing more;" and suddenly, while I spoke, Johnny looked round in a strange, frightened way, and the front-door opened and shut with a bang, and the father sprang to his feet and tore open the inner door, and stood struck to stone before that creature standing there, white as if moonlight lay upon her.

"Oh, John! then you're not going to forgive me?" she cried, piercingly. And at that he had caught the shivering thing in his arms, and had brought her in and set her before the fire, and then he was down on his knees beside her, hiding his face against the little bundle at her breast, and shaking with loud sobs. She put up her little cold hand, and pushed back his great flushed face, and looked at it.

"Oh, John!" she whispered; "then you are really going to forgive me?"

"Forgive my darling!" he cried, and fell, for answer, to kissing her forehead and chin and the cheeks blooming now like roses, till Johnny woke from his daze of terror and doubt, and with a rousing roar put in his own claim to notice.

"I don't know how I came there, John," said she at last, in a timid, trembling tone, with one arm round Johnny, and with John's arms round all three; "but when I first remember, I was lying on a hospital cot three hundred miles away, and the baby beside me. And they said I'd been picked up at the station by the officers and brought there, and the baby had been born just afterward. It was true, wasn't it? It's our baby. See: there's your big temple and your eyebrows, and there's Johnny's nose."

"I don't care whose nose it is," cried John. "It's my baby! It's my Anne, all right! And oh! I thank the good God above me, who brought you nome to me, and turned my trouble into thanksgiving."

And as for me, I was sniveling so myself by this time, and so afraid I should be seen or heard, that I just hustled on my things in the entry, and crept out and rushed home the best way I could. But the last thing I saw, as I came away, was the picture of Anne, all herself, tossing her baby in the ruddy flashes of the fire-light, with Johnny hanging round her neck; while her husband stood just before her, half leaning on the shelf, and looking at the group as if for him they held all heaven and earth.

FAMILY LIFE IN A FASHIONABLE RESTAURANT.

See illustration on page 793.

AT this season, sacred to family gatherings and fireside pleasures, such a scene as that which our artist has so graphically depicted strikes a chill to our heart, and makes us realize whither we are drifting. For this is no fancy sketch, no occasional picture, but the daily domestic life of thousands and tens of thousands of families in the great cities which dot our country in all directions. At first sight every thing is dazzling. The restaurant is well appointed, the cookery French, the array of glass and silver glittering, the viands plentiful, and the attendance good. But, with all these excellent things, there is something lacking. An air of indifferentism pervades every thing. There is no warmth in the scene, no heart, no sentiment. There is no individualism any where. Groups gather around the little round tables, catching bits of each other's conversation, and feeling thereby cut off from that confidential intercourse which is so pleasant and so conducive to good digestion around the family board. There is no special interest in any thing. The dishes come and go as strangers. There is no delicious household gossip about the merits and purchase of this joint, or the superiority of those strawberries over all others in market this morning. Then all days are alike in a restaurant. There is no holiday fare there. Thanksgivings and Christmases are marked by no white stones. There are no special dishes hallowed by associations with certain days. And so the appetite is palled by having turkey and venison continually within call, and grows indifferent to all the little devices by which it is stimulated in smaller households.

Fatally common as hotel and restaurant life is becoming, it is really antagonistic to the genius of our people. We inherit from our English ancestors a strong exclusiveness and love of home. "No house was ever built large enough for two families" is the Englishman's motto. Hotels, apartment-houses, étages, and all the rest, are of Continental growth. And however much we may be caught by this kind of life, and welcome it as a variety, we inevitably drift back to a longing, at least, for our own house, sacred to our own family, which shall be an exponent of our individualism. The trouble is, that to gratify this longing and return to our castle we must set at naught all the obligations imposed on modern society, or wear our lives out in endeavoring to live up to the standard which growing luxury has fixed as the most desirable. It is easy to shift the blame of this from one to another class, and to say that women would find no difficulty in keeping house if they would learn housekeeping. Until our whole community is willing to simplify their habits and modes of life in all respects we shall see home life diminish and hotel life increase. As it is, artificial wants and opinions, engendered by modern so-called civilization, are eating out the heart of our people. And nothing can be worse than the effect of such a life on children. How can parents teach their children temperance in the face of Champagne corks snapping every where about them? How can they inculcate lessons of simplicity of dress when their precepts are counteracted by the silks and satins of all their fellow-boarders? How can they insist on a plain, healthful diet when the tantalizing cates that cover the tables are swallowed unscrupulously by all the guests? And how can they bring them up in those habits of wise frugality and self-denial which alone can insure success and virtue in life when the example of reckless extravagance is set on every side? No worse training-school for children can be found than a hotel; and we wish that words could be found strong enough to induce those parents not bound to this life by unconquerable circumstances—and such there are—to return to the only natural and healthful mode of living; to keep house for themselves on whatever scale their means will allow, and make a home for their children which shall be worthy the name, and not a mere reflection of the lives of others.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN this progressive age, when all classes are clamoring for "rights," the pedestrian of New York seems to have no potent voice. Loud and frequent may be his cries, but they are drowned in the clatter of carts, the rumble of cars, the rattle of coupés and carriages. If a citizen desires to cross Broadway, particularly if it be any where below Canal Street, he can take his choice either to thread his way daintily, deliberately, and dangerously within one inch of a horse's nose on one side, and one inch of a carriage wheel on the other side (thankful if both are not even nearer), or he can make a fierce diagonal rush through some fancied opening above or below the solid, ceaseless, moving mass before him. A false step, or a slippery bit of fruit skin, of course will prove fatal; otherwise there is a chance of successfully reaching the opposite sidewalk. True, at some points there are policemen, who politely offer their much-needed escort to ladies; but there are gentlemen who, having once or twice been trampled under the feet of omnibus horses, have a wholesome dread of Broadway crossings. At Fulton Ferry it is almost as much as one's life is worth to attempt to cross South Street at some times of day. Drivers of carts and carriages every where seem under the impression that the pedestrian has no right of way. The grocer's wagon comes whizzing around the corner like a shot. If you chance to be crossing the street, the young Jehu may give an unearthly whoop as a warning, and you may reach the sidewalk in safety. The insufficiently guarded railroad crossings in the vicinity of our city dépôts are fearful death-traps, which should never be suffered to exist. The fatal accidents which have recently occurred at the Grand Central Dépôt demand that this danger should be promptly remedied. While it is true that the crowded state of such a great metropolis as this necessarily involves much difficulty in the locomotion of vehicles, and considerable hazard to foot passengers, it is a right that pedestrians should claim, that the hazard to life and limb in the thoroughfares of the city should be reduced to the lowest possible point.

In future ages we may hope for exemption from yellow fever, if the Darwinian theory is correct. Statistics indicate that during the recent yellow fever plague in Buenos Ayres monkeys suffered more severely from it than man. Hence the disease is one inherited from our ancestors (according to Darwin); consequently we shall outgrow it in time.

The first edition of Webster's Dictionary ever published was a small 12mo volume, bearing this imprint: "From Sidney's Press, for Hudson & Goodwin, booksellers, Hartford, and Increase Cooke & Co., booksellers, New Haven: 1806."

A London physician, Dr. Lankester, in a recent report concerning the sanitary condition of that city, says: "The small-pox is now slowly departing from the metropolis, after slaying 5000 persons, and maiming, disfiguring, and pauperizing about 100,000 more. It must have cost the metropolis at least £100,000, a tenth part of which sum, judiciously expended, would have cut short this epidemic at its very commencement."

Every public library and reading-room in Chicago was destroyed by the late fire except that of the Michigan Avenue Free Library Association, which, being only a few months old, had but a small collection of books and papers. This library is well located, has ample rooms, and is open to all without charge.

It may be a fact of some interest to the most literary of our readers that a grammar of the Pehlvi language has just been issued by Dustoor Peshotun Behramjee Sunjana, high-priest of the Parsees of Bombay, principal of Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy Zurtoshti Madressa, member of the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, Fellow of the Bombay University, and member of the German Oriental Society. It contains quotations and examples from original works and a glossary of words having affinity with the Semitic language.

A French lady of rank has been raised from misery to happiness by electrical applications which have changed her nose from a blooming rose into a delicate lily. This wonderful discovery for the relief of red noses was made by one Dr. Bernsie.

When the Grand Duke Alexis first entered the residence of Minister Catacazy, in Washington, he was received at the door by Madame Catacazy. It is an ancient custom of Russia, that when any member of the imperial family enters the house of a subject the lady of the house should offer bread and salt in token of hospitality. In accordance with this custom Madame Catacazy held in her hands a silver salver, on which was a large round loaf of Russian black bread, such as is served on the table of the emperor, as well as of the peasant. In the top of the loaf was a small indenture, in which was placed a gold-lined silver salt-cellar filled with salt. The lady presented it, saying, in Russian, "I offer you bread and salt." The grand duke received it from her hands, and after tasting the bread, passed it to one of his suite.

A composition has been discovered by a chemist of Vienna which will render even the slight material of ballet dancers' dresses fire-proof. The experiments in regard to this composition have been so successful that the Prince of Lichtenstein has ordered a wooden theatre to be erected outside of Vienna, the boards of which are to be saturated with the fire-proof composition. If the building resists fire the discoverer has an order to make the scenery of the Vienna City Theatre uninflammable.

Well-drawn word-pictures of child life seldom fail to interest the sympathetic; the recounting of youthful friendships stirs the memory of times long gone by in responsive hearts. "Joshua Marvel"—a novel of unusual merit—as it progresses treats, like other novels, of grown-up persons. But the charm of its earlier chapters is the tender, boyish love that existed between Joshua and the crippled Dan. The burial of the pet canary, Golden Cloud, is a charming episode. And what more touchingly beautiful than Dan's cheerful faith when he, lying on his bed, told Joshua that he felt that he should be "a helpless cripple all his life?"

"Poor, dear Dan!" said Joshua, checking his sobs with difficulty.

"Poor Dan! Not at all! I can read, I can think, I can love you, Jo, all the same. I shall live in you. You are my friend, and, strong as you are, you can't love me more than I love you. And even if I was to die, dear—"

"Don't say that, Dan; I can't bear to think of it."

"Why? It isn't dreadful. If I was to die, we should still be friends, we should still love each other. Don't you love Golden Cloud?"

Joshua whispered, "Yes."

"But Golden Cloud is not here. Yet you love him. And so do I, more than I did when the pet was alive. I don't quite know how it is with birds, but I do know how it is with us. If you was here, Jo, and I was there, we should meet again."

The toilette in which Madame Catacazy appeared on the evening of the Grand Duke's arrival was very handsome. It was of pale lemon-colored silk tissue, or crêpe de Paris, of very fine texture. The train was long, trimmed with a flounce bound with satin. The long over-skirt, with apron front, was trimmed with a ruffle headed by satin piping. Satin bows were scattered over the skirt. The corsage, which was cut high, with surplice front and loose sleeves, was of delicate white striped gauze heavily embroidered in gold. Madame Catacazy's hair was dressed in long flowing curls, with a braided coronet across her head, and ornamented only with a few buds of natural flowers.

Professor Hayden, chief of the Geological Survey of the Territories, has brought back with him several tons of geological specimens, which are now at the Smithsonian Institute. He and his party of thirty-five spent about seven weeks in exploring the valley of the Upper Yellow Stone River and Lake, and the sources of the Snake and Missouri rivers in Southern Montana.

The following anecdote is told of the German occupation of France: A lady residing in the Department of the Seine-et-Marne had a Prussian quartered at her house from the commencement of the invasion. On taking possession of his apartments he said that he was deaf, so that the lady did not hesitate to talk before him as if he were not present. At last the soldier informed his hostess that he had been ordered elsewhere.

"Madame," he said, "I wish you good-day."

"And I," said the lady, smiling with exquisite grace—"I wish you may break your neck on the stairs, you assassin!"

"Oh, madame," interrupted the Prussian, "excuse me: I forgot to tell you that I am hard of hearing only by the order of my general."

The press has greater freedom in Russia, it is said, than it has in any other country in Europe, excepting England.

A very pleasant charity is that of the Flower-Mission in Boston. During the past year the ladies connected with it have distributed among the sick in hospitals and in poor homes 11,671 bouquets and 970 parcels of fruit.

The observatory of the Sheffield Scientific School was recently visited by some ladies who desired to gaze at the pale moon. One of them, observing through the telescope the jagged edge of the orb, became enthusiastic, and exclaimed, in raptures: "Oh how divine! It looks exactly like Hamburg edging!"—a simile so very striking that ladies need not trouble themselves to look at the moon through telescopes; a bit of muslin edging will suffice.

Encke's comet, which is now exciting considerable interest among the scientific, is a very little body—if body it has—compared to many of the erratic travelers of the skies, but of some importance. Until recently it was believed that all comets, in passing away from the sun on their outward course, went far beyond the solar system. Encke, however, in studying the orbit of this little comet, found that it coursed along an ellipse so small as to be contained within the orbit of the planet Jupiter, and therefore not carrying the comet a sixth part of the way toward the boundary of our solar system. Around this circuit the comet was found to run in the surprisingly short period of 1200 days, or about three and one-third years. This was not only an interesting discovery, so far as it related to comets, but it was the means of settling various scientific facts, among which is that there is no such thing as pure space; for Encke's comet plainly shows that it passes continually through a resisting medium of some sort, which has sensibly shortened its orbit since the first observations were recorded. If this process goes on, it is, of course, only a question of time when the comet will fall into and be absorbed by the sun.

On the first evening of his arrival at the Clarendon Hotel the Grand Duke dined in the strictest privacy, only the Russian minister being present, with the admiral of the Russian fleet and the members of his Highness's suite.

It is customary among the members of the imperial family of Russia, after landing from any voyage, to repair at once to some church, and there give thanks for their safe passage, postponing all business and pleasure until this duty has been performed. Immediately after reviewing the troops on the day of his landing, the Grand Duke went, with his suite, to the little Greek church near Fiftieth Street, where a short service was conducted by Father Bjerring.

USEFUL RECIPES.

COCOA-NUT DROPS.—Mix with one pound of grated cocoa-nut one pound of sugar, a scant half pound of flour, and three eggs.

"POP-OVER."—Into two tea-cupfuls of milk stir smoothly the same quantity of flour and a very little salt; add the yolks of two eggs, and the whites of the eggs beaten to a froth; dip two scant table-spoonfuls of the mixture into each patty-pan, and bake twenty minutes in an oven hot enough for bread.

COCOA-NUT JUMBLES.—One and a half pounds of grated cocoa-nut, the same quantity of sugar, and half a pound of butter; cream well together the butter and sugar, then add the cocoa-nut, a little wine, and six eggs, leaving out the yolks of three.

GRAHAM BISCUIT (excellent).—Into one quart of Graham flour stir half a tea-spoonful of baking powder, a little salt, and enough sweet milk to make a thin batter; add the yolks of three eggs, and the whites slightly frothed.

PICKLED OYSTERS.—Strain the juice off one hundred oysters; to it put two dozen cloves, two dozen grains of black pepper, mace and salt to taste; let it come to a boil; add the oysters, letting it all come to the boiling-point; take off the fire, add eight table-spoonfuls of cider vinegar, and, if wine is liked, the same quantity of wine that there is of vinegar.

SILVER POLISH.—To one quart of rain-water add two ounces of hartshorn and three ounces of precipitated chalk; put into a bottle, keep well corked, and shake before using.

LEMON CAKE.—Three tea-cupfuls of fine sugar beaten to a cream with one tea-cupful of butter; add yolks of five eggs, and one tea-cupful of sweet milk in which a tea-spoonful of carbonate of soda has been dissolved; mix in four tea-cupfuls of flour, and the beaten whites of the five eggs, alternating them; bake in two tins. For the icing beat the whites of two eggs with two tea-spoonfuls of corn starch, eighteen tea-spoonfuls of flour sugar, and two tea-spoonfuls of lemon juice; make it perfectly light, and, when the cakes are cool, spread on with a knife dipped frequently in cold water to prevent sticking.

causes of his ruin. She took one of her nephews on her lap, and talked to him, and let him play with the trinkets on her chain. Both the children were bright and intelligent enough, but had that air of premature sharpness which comes from constant intercourse with grown-up people, and an early initiation in the difficulties of existence.

She could only stay half an hour with her sister-in-law; but she could see that her visit of duty had gratified the poor little neglected wife. She had not come empty-handed, but had brought an offering for Bessie Lovel which made the tired eyes brighten with something of their old light—a large oval locket of massive dead gold, with a Maltese cross of small diamonds upon it; one of the simplest ornaments which Daniel Granger had given her, and which she fancied herself justified in parting with. She had taken it to a jeweler in the Palais Royal, who had arranged a lock of her dark brown hair, with a true-lover's knot of brilliants, inside the locket, and had engraved the words "From Clarissa" on the back.

Mrs. Lovel clasped her hands in rapture as Clarissa opened the morocco case and showed her this jewel.

"For me!" she cried. "I never had any thing half as beautiful in my life. And your 'air, too!" She said "'air" in her excitement. "How good of you to give it to me! I don't know how to thank you."

And the poor little woman made a rapid mental review of her wardrobe, wondering if she had any gown good enough to wear with that splendid jewel. Her purple silk—the one silk dress she possessed—was a little shiny and shabby by daylight, but looked very well by candle-light still, she thought. She was really delighted with the locket. In all her life she had had so few presents, and this one gift was worth three times the sum of them. But Clarissa spoke of it in the lightest, most careless way.

"I wanted to bring you some little souvenir," she said, "and I thought you might like this. And now I must say good-by, Bessie. I may call you Bessie, mayn't I? And remember, you must call me Clarissa. I am sorry I am obliged to hurry away like this; but I expect Mr. Granger back rather early, and I want to be at home when he returns. Good-by, dear!"

She kissed her brother's wife, who clung to her affectionately, touched by her kindness; kissed the two little nephews also, one of whom caught hold of her dress and said,

"You gave me that money for toys the other day, didn't you, Aunt Clarissa?"

"Yes, darling."

"But I didn't have it to spend, though. Pa said he'd lay it out for me, and he brought me home a cart from the Boulevard, but it didn't cost two napoleons. It was a trumpery cart, that went smash the first time that Arthur and I stood in it."

"You shouldn't stand in a toy cart, dear. I'll bring you some toys the next time I come to see mamma."

They were out on the landing by this time. Clarissa disengaged herself from the little fellow, and went quickly down the darksome staircase.

"Will that be soon?" the boy called over the balusters.

"I do hope I shall be able to keep it," said Bessie Lovel, presently, as she stood in the window gloating over her locket: whereby it will be seen that Austin's wife did not feel so secure as she might have done in the possession of her treasure.

CHAPTER XXXV.

"AND THROUGH THY LIFE HAVE I NOT WRIT MY NAME?"

MIDWINTER had come, and the pleasures and splendors of Paris were at their apogee. The city was at its gayest—that beautiful city, which we can never see again as we have seen it—which we lament as some fair and radiant creature that has come to an untimely death. Paris the beautiful, Paris the beloved, imperial Paris, with her air of classic splendor, like the mistress of a Cæsar, was in these days overshadowed by no threatening thunder-cloud, forerunner of the tempest and earthquake that was to come. The winter season had begun; and all those wanderers who had been basking through the autumn under the blue skies that roof the Pyrenees, or dawdling away existence in German gambling saloons, or climbing Alpine peaks, or paddling down the Danube, flocked back to the central city of civilization in time to assist at Patti's reappearance in the Rue Lepelletier, or to applaud a new play of Sardou's at the Gymnase.

Among this flock of returning pilgrims came George Fairfax, very much the worse for two or three months spent in restless meanderings between Baden and Homburg, with the consciousness of a large income at his disposal, and a certain reckless indifference as to which way his life drifted, that had grown upon him of late years.

He met Mr. and Mrs. Granger, within twenty-four hours of his arrival in Paris, at a ball at the British embassy—the inaugural fête of the season, as it were, to which the master of Arden Court, by right of his wealth and weight in the North Riding, had been bidden. The embassadorial card had ignored Miss Granger, much to the damsel's dissatisfaction.

Clarissa came upon Mr. Fairfax unawares in the glazed colonnade upon which the ball-room opened, where he was standing alone, staring moodily at a tall arum lily shooting up from a bed of ferns, when she approached on her partner's arm, taking the regulation promenade after a waltz. The well-remembered profile, which had grown sharper and sterner since she had seen it for the first time, struck her with a sudden thrill, half pleasure, half terror. Yes; she was pleased to see him; she, the wife of Daniel Granger, felt her heart beating faster, felt a sense of joy strangely mingled with fear. In all the occupations of her life, even amidst the all-absorbing delight of her child's society, she had not been able quite to forget this man. The one voice that had touched her heart, the one face that had haunted her girlish dream, came back to her again and again in spite of herself. In the dead of the night she had started up from her pillow with the sound of George Fairfax's familiar tones in her ears; in too many a dream she had acted over again the meeting in the orchard, and heard his voice upbraiding her, and had seen his face dark and angry in the dim light. She had done her duty to Daniel Granger; but she had not forgotten the man she had loved, and who had loved her after his fashion; and often in her prayers she had entreated that she might never see him again.

Her prayers had not been granted—perhaps they did not come so entirely from the heart as prayers should that would fain bring a blessing. He was here; here to remind her how much she had loved him in the days gone by—to bewilder her brain with conflicting thoughts. He turned suddenly from that gloomy contemplation of the arum lily, and met her face to face.

That evening dress of ours, which has been so liberally abused for its ugliness, is not without a certain charm when worn by a handsome man. A tall man looks taller in the perfect black. The broad expanse of shirt front, with its delicate embroidery, not obtrusively splendid, but minutely elaborate rather, involving the largest expenditure of needle-work to produce the smallest and vaguest effect—a suspicion of richness, as it were, nothing more; the snowy cambric contrasts with the bronzed visage of the soldier, or blends harmoniously with the fair complexion of the fopling who has never exposed his countenance to the rough winds of heaven; the expanse of linen proclaims the breadth of chest, and gives a factitious slimness to the waist. Such a costume, relieved, perhaps, by the flash of some single jewel, not large, but priceless, is scarcely unbecoming, and possibly more æsthetic in its simplicity than the gem-besprinkled brocades and velvets of a Buckingham in the days when men wore jeweled cloaks on their shoulders, and point d'Alençon flounces round their knees.

George Fairfax, in his evening dress, looked supremely handsome. It is a poor thing, of course, in man or woman, this beauty; but it has its charm, nevertheless, and in the being who is loved for other and far higher qualities the charm is tenfold. Few women, perhaps, have ever fallen in love with a man on account of his good looks; they leave such weak worship for the stronger sex; but, having loved him for some other indefinable reason, are not indifferent to the attraction of splendid eyes or a faultless profile.

Clarissa trembled a little as she held out her hand to be clasped in George Fairfax's strong fingers, the quiet pressure whereof seemed to say, "You know that you and I are something more to each other than the world supposes."

She could not meet him without betraying, by some faint sign, that there was neither forgetfulness nor indifference in her mind as to the things that concerned him.

Her late partner—a youthful secretary of legation, with straw-colored hair and an incipient mustache—murmured something civil, and slid away, leaving those two alone beside the arum lily, or as much alone as they could be in a place where the guests were circulating freely, and about half a dozen flirtations ripening amidst the shining foliage of orange-trees and camellias.

"I thought I should meet you here to-night," he said. "I came here in the hope of meeting you."

She was not an experienced woman of the world, skilled in the art of warding off such a speech as this. She had never flirted in her life, and sorely felt the want of that facility which comes from long practice.

"Have you seen my husband?" she asked, awkwardly enough, in her distress.

"I did not come to see Mr. Granger. It was the hope of seeing you that brought me here. I am as great a fool as I was at Hale Castle, you see, Clarissa. There are some follies of which a man can not cure himself."

"Mr. Fairfax!"

She looked up at him gravely, reproachfully, with as much anger as she could bring herself to feel against him; but as their eyes met, something in his—a look that told too plainly of passion and daring—made her eyelids fall, and she stood before him trembling like a frightened child. And this moment was perhaps the turning point in Clarissa's life—the moment in which she took the first step on the wrong road that was to lead her so far away from the sacred paths of innocence and peace.

George Fairfax drew her hand through his arm—she had neither strength nor resolution to oppose him—and led her away to the quietest corner of the colonnade, a recess sheltered by orange-trees, and provided with a rustic bench.

There is no need to record every word that was spoken there; it was the old story of a man's selfish, guilty love and a woman's sinful weakness. He spoke, and Clarissa heard him, not willingly, but with faint efforts of resistance that ended in nothing. She heard him. Never again could she meet Daniel Granger's honest gaze as she had done—never, it seemed to her, could she lose the sense of her sin.

He told her how she had ruined his life. That was his chief reproach, and a reproach that a woman can rarely hear unmoved. He painted in the briefest words the picture of what he might have been, and what he was. If his life were wrecked utterly—and from his own account of himself it must needs be so—the wreck was her fault. He had been ready to sacrifice every thing for her. She had basely cheated him.

His upbraiding stung her too keenly; she could keep her secret no longer.

"I had promised Laura Armstrong," she said—"I had promised her that no power on earth should tempt me to marry you—if you should ask me."

"You had promised!" he cried, contemptuously. "Promised that shallow trickster! I might have known she had a hand in my misery. And you thought a promise to her more sacred than good faith to me? That was hard, Clarissa."

"It was hard," she answered, in a heart-broken voice.

"My God!" he cried, looking at her with those passionate eyes; "and yet you loved me all the time?"

"With all my heart," she faltered, and then hid her face in her hands.

It seemed as if the confession had been wrung from her somehow. In the next moment she hated herself for having said the words, and calming herself with a great effort, said to him, quietly,

"And now that you know how weak I was when I seemed indifferent to you, have pity upon me, Mr. Fairfax."

"Pity!" he exclaimed. "It is not a question of pity: it is a question of two lives that have been blighted through your foolish submission to that plotting woman. But there must be some recompense to be found in the future for all the tortures of the past. I have broken every tie for your sake, Clarissa; you must make some sacrifice for me."

Clarissa looked at him wonderingly. Was he so mad as to suppose that she was of the stuff that makes runaway wives?

"Your father tempted my mother, Mr. Fairfax," she said, "but I thank Heaven she escaped him. The rôle of seducer seems hereditary in your family. You could not make me break my word when I was free to marry you; do you believe that you can make me false to my husband?"

"Yes, Clarissa. I swore as much that night in the orchard—swore that I would win you in spite of the world."

"And my son," she said, with the tone she might have used if he had been one-and-twenty—"is he to blush for his mother by-and-by?"

"I have never found that sons have a faculty for blushing on account of that kind of thing," Mr. Fairfax answered, lightly.—"Egad, there'd be a great deal of blushing going on at some of the crack clubs if they had!" he said to himself afterward.

Clarissa rose from the seat among the orange-trees, and George Fairfax did not attempt to detain her.

He offered her his arm to conduct her back to the ball-room; they had been quite long enough away. He did not want to attract attention, and he had said as much as he cared to say.

He felt very sure of his ground now. She loved him—that was the all-important point. His wounded self-esteem was solaced by this knowledge. His old sense of power came back to him. He had felt himself all at sea, as it were, when he believed it possible that any woman he cared to win could be indifferent to him.

From the other side of the ball-room Mr. Granger saw his wife re-enter arm in arm with George Fairfax. The sight gave him a little shock. He had hoped that young man was far enough away, ruining himself in a fashionable manner somehow; and here he was in attendance upon Clarissa. He remembered how his daughter had said that George Fairfax was sure to meet them in Paris, and his own anger at the suggestion. He would be obliged to be civil to the young man, of course. There was no reason, indeed, that he should be otherwise than civil—only that lurking terror in his mind that this was the man his wife had loved. Had loved? is there any past tense to that verb?

Mrs. Granger dropped Mr. Fairfax's arm directly they came to a vacant seat.

"I am rather tired," she said, in her coldest voice. "I think I'll rest a little, if you please. I needn't detain you. I dare say you are engaged for the next dance."

"No. I seldom dance."

He stood by her side. One rapid glance across the room had shown him Daniel Granger making his way toward them, looking unspeakably ponderous and British amidst that butterfly crowd. He did not mean to leave her just yet, in spite of her proprietor's approach. She belonged to him, he told himself, by right of that confession just now in the conservatory. It was only a question when he should take her to himself. He felt like some bold rover of the seas, who has just captured a gallant craft, and carries her proudly over the ocean chained to his gloomy hull.

She was his, he told himself; but before he could carry her away from her present surroundings he must play the base part which he had once thought he never could play. He must be civil to Daniel Granger, mask his batteries, win his footing in the household, so that he might have easy access to the woman he loved, until one day the thunder-bolt would descend, and an honest man be left desolate, "with his household gods shattered." It was just one of those sins that will not bear contemplation. George Fairfax was fain to shut his eyes upon the horror and vileness of it, and only to say to himself, doggedly, "I have sworn to win her."

Mr. Granger greeted him civilly enough presently, and with the stereotyped cordiality which may mean any thing or nothing. Was Mr. Fairfax going to remain long in Paris? Yes, he meant to winter there, if nothing better turned up.

"After all, you see," he said, "there is no place like Paris. One gets tired of it, of course, in time; but I find that in other places one is always tired."

"A very pleasant ball," remarked Mr. Gran-

...with the air of saying something original. "...ve been dancing, I suppose?"

"...replied Mr. Fairfax, smiling; "I have ...into my property. I don't dance. 'I ...myself,' as our friends here say."

...thought, as he spoke, of sundry break-neck ...ps and maelstrom waltzes danced in gardens ...saloons the very existence whereof was ignored by or unknown to respectability; and then thought, "If I were safely planted on the other side of the world, with her for my wife, it would cost me no more to cut all that kind of thing than it would to throw away a handful of withered flowers."

LOVE IN THE WINTER PALACE;

OR, THE CZAR NICHOLAS AS A MATCH-MAKER.

IN a former number of the Bazar we gave the history of the betrothal and marriage of the Emperor Nicholas of Russia (the grandfather of the Prince Alexis, who comes to make our personal acquaintance) to Princess Charlotte of Prussia, and our fair readers will not have failed to admire the ingenious way in which the handsome suitor pleaded his cause with the queen of his heart. To-day we propose to present the same prince in another love-affair—no longer as a hero wooing for himself, but in the more modest part of a match-maker intent on causing the happiness of a beloved daughter, even at the sacrifice of his personal pride and his most cherished hopes.

It was in the year 1838. At the court of St. Petersburg there lived at that time a young lady so lovely, so charming, so beautiful, that it had almost passed into a proverb among the courtiers that the most powerful monarch, if he had met her in a peasant's cot, would have turned his back on all the princesses of Europe, and would have offered her his hand and his throne. This young lady, born in the shadow of the proud throne of the czars, was Maria Nicolajewna, the eldest daughter of the Emperor Nicholas.

She had just attained her nineteenth year; and when her father beheld her, blooming and fragrant like the flowers of May, and saw that nearly every crown prince in Europe entertained the hope of winning the heart and hand of this matchless beauty, he commenced himself looking about for the most eligible, the worthiest, and the most powerful consort for his darling.

"Dear Maria," said he one day to the princess, with the kindest smile which his stern features could command, "you are now old enough to think of getting married pretty soon. There are quite a number of suitors for your hand, and, after mature deliberation, I have selected for your consort a prince who in due time will make you a queen, but who is, at the same time, a man who will make you happy."

The princess blushed and grew pale at the same moment.

"A man," she gasped forth, with a violent effort to appear composed, "who will make me happy?"

Perhaps there was a touch of doubt or anxiety in the tone of her voice, perhaps the trembling motion of her lips betrayed the fear which this announcement had awakened in her heart; for when she looked up and fixed her eyes inquiringly upon the countenance of her father she saw at a glance that the smile had disappeared from his features, and that a threatening cloud was gathering on his forehead. The princess recoiled from the tempest of wrath which might burst forth at any moment, and added, in a faltering voice,

"Command me, your majesty, what I am to do. I shall obey."

"You will obey!" exclaimed the emperor, in a voice trembling with emotion and anger. "You will obey! Am I to understand that it will be mere obedience on your part if you accept a husband from my hands?"

The grand duchess remained silent. But during this short pause she trembled like a flower moved by the breeze, and a tear which, in spite of the most painful efforts she made to repress it, rolled down her cheeks was a mute and yet eloquent answer to this question.

"What," resumed the emperor, "you keep silence! Can it be possible that you have made already a choice for yourself? Tell me honestly and sincerely, Maria."

The young princess still remained silent; but the trembling nervousness became so violent that she was on the point of fainting.

"Speak out frankly and openly, Maria," said the czar, in a gentler tone. "I command it."

The princess threw herself at the feet of the czar. For a moment she was unable to utter any thing but moans and sighs, and to clasp the knees of her father with a convulsive grasp. But then, overcoming her emotion and her fear, she raised her hands imploringly toward the emperor, and said, in a voice almost stifled by her tears, "As you command me to speak the truth, I will be sincere to you. Yes, I have made my own choice! My heart is no longer my own. It belongs to a young man who does not know that I love him—who will never know it, if such be your will! He has seen me only at long intervals: we have exchanged only a few words with each other, and if you wish, we will never speak to each other again."

Nicholas made no reply. He had grown pale, and, as he was wont to do in the moments of his greatest and most painful excitement or anguish, he paced to and fro through the spacious apartment. This silent walk lasted three or four minutes, during which the princess remained in a kneeling attitude, waiting for the address of her father, and not daring to interrupt his meditation.

Evidently he was anxious to learn the name of the happy mortal who, as it appeared, had won without an effort, without a contest, the priceless jewel which he held dearer than the crown of Russia itself, the heart of Maria—and yet he was afraid of this name! He, the all-powerful monarch, who for a mere whim would have defied the united armies of Europe, trembled like a coward at the mere thought of hearing the name of the young man who disputed with him the possession of his most precious jewel. But at last he recovered his self-command.

"Is he a king?" he asked.

"No, father."

"But at least the son of a king?"

"No, father."

"Ah! Then he is not a crown prince?"

"No, father."

After every new question, in this downward descent in the social scale from the very pinnacle of human greatness, the czar made a short pause, during which he gasped for breath.

"Is he a foreigner?" he asked, with a painful effort.

"Yes, father."

The emperor, as if overwhelmed and crushed by this terrible information, sank back upon his chair, and covered his face with both his hands.

The grand duchess did not dare to stir or to speak. Quietly, like a victim waiting for the death-stroke of the executioner, she bowed her beautiful head, ready to undergo the wrath of the emperor, which might burst upon her head at any moment.

"Is this man whom you love in Russia?" the emperor at last resumed his examination.

"Yes, your majesty."

"Ah! He is here, in St. Petersburg?"

"Yes, father."

The voice of the grand duchess grew fainter and fainter, and for the second time it seemed as if the anguish and emotion of her heart would overpower her physical strength. But, as if to counterbalance these impressions, and to dispel her nervousness by his sternness, the czar suddenly asked her, in a menacing tone,

"And where can I see him?"

"You can see him to-morrow morning at the military review."

"And how am I to recognize him?"

"By the green plumage of his hat, and by his splendid black horse."

"Very well, I shall look out for him," replied the czar, and dismissed his daughter without another word.

The grand duchess, almost paralyzed with fear and excitement, reeled out of the room.

As soon as the czar was alone he began to pace the room in the most violent agitation. The tremulous motion of his lips and the frightful pallor which mantled his noble features gave evidence of the tempest raging in his breast. A terrible struggle took place in the heart of this proudest monarch of modern times, between his pride and his paternal love.

"Pshaw!" he ejaculated at last; "the whole affair is nothing but a ridiculous whim of Maria's. I am foolish, indeed, to attach so much importance to it, and to allow myself to be alarmed. She will soon get over her childish fancy. She must forget it! I shall compel her to forget it!"

But the very moment he had come to this peremptory conclusion of crushing the tender flower of love in the heart of his daughter the tearful face of the young girl flitted before his imagination, and appealed to his heart, which throbbed warmly for her.

On the day following, the eagle eye of the czar looked with strange restlessness at the brilliant spectacle of the military review which was passing before him with all the splendor and regularity of a grand opera performance. Hurriedly the czar glanced from one regiment to the other, as if searching for one single object of greater importance to him than all the rest of the world. Not one of the princes and generals surrounding him dared to interrupt or to address him, for there was a frown on the brow of Nicholas which seemed to be portentous of a terrible storm. With some disappointment the czar suddenly turned round to Prince Galitzin, one of his aids, as if to make an inquiry, but at the same moment he closed his lips, which he had already opened, and his eyes remained fixed upon a young officer in his own suite whom one of the group of officers in the rear of the emperor had until then concealed from his view. The young officer was the very ideal of manly beauty and grace, and the splendid uniform of a Bavarian colonel of cavalry seemed to be the most appropriate to set off his personal charms to the greatest advantage. There was a thoughtful and kind expression in his face which immediately prepossessed the beholder in his favor, while the classic mould of his features had been equally admired in his father and his grandmother, both of whom had played conspicuous parts in the history of Europe. The young man, who attracted the emperor's attention both by the large tuft of green feathers in his hat and by the splendid black steed he mounted, was none other than the young Duke of Leuchtenberg, the son of Eugene Beauharnais, and the grandson of the Empress Josephine, Napoleon's first wife.

An exclamation both of surprise and relief escaped the lips of the czar. In the twinkling of an eye he had comprehended how difficult it would be to get such an accomplished lover out of the way, but, at the same time, the thought of the high descent of the object of his daughter's affection consoled him a little. The Duke of Leuchtenberg was the son of Prince Eugene by his marriage with the daughter of the King of Bavaria; so, if not the son of a king, he was, at least, the grandson of a king by his mother, and the grandson of an empress by his father. This was something to compensate for the loss of a crown. But, at all events, the czar resolved to send the young duke away from St. Petersburg, and to dismiss him in such a manner as to give him to understand that it would be better for him not to return. He turned to one of his aids, and ordered the Duke of Leuchtenberg to appear before him.

In two minutes the duke was in the presence of the czar. But at the very moment when Nicholas, with a stern and almost contemptuous face, turned toward him in order to tell him to leave the capital and the empire within twenty-four hours, he cast a side-glance on the imperial carriage, in which both the empress and the Grand Duchess Maria were witnessing the review. And the sight which there presented itself to his eyes restrained the words which he was about to utter; for, with a faint cry of terror, the young grand duchess fell back in a swoon upon her seat. She had followed with her eyes every motion of her father, and when she saw him sending for the Duke of Leuchtenberg, and the moment which was to decide her happiness or misery throughout life was at hand, her fear and emotion had overcome her firmness.

Without saying a word to the duke, but only casting on him a menacing glance, the emperor turned his horse and galloped off toward the carriage.

For six weeks the czar employed all possible means to divert the grand duchess from her infatuation for the young German duke. Persuasion, kindness, severity, threats, intrigues—every thing was tried; but every thing proved vain and futile. At the close of the first week the grand duchess seemed composed and quiet; at the close of the second she cried and wept in secret; at the close of the third she wept openly; at the close of the fourth she took the heroical resolution to sacrifice her love, and perhaps her life, to the cruelty of her father; at the close of the fifth she was so ill that her physicians grew alarmed at the state of her health; at the close of the sixth she might have died but for the assurance of the emperor that she should marry the Duke of Leuchtenberg.

While his lady-love was being exposed to such terrible trials, the Duke of Leuchtenberg could not fail perceiving that, for some reason unknown to him, he had lost the grace of the emperor. He did not dare to make any inquiries which might have informed him of the cause, but made up his mind to return forthwith to Munich, instead of submitting to the whim of an autocrat to whom he owed no allegiance. He was just on the point of executing this plan, and had already fixed upon a day for his departure, when one afternoon an officer of the emperor's staff appeared in his room and ordered him to report at once to the emperor.

It was not without serious misgivings and apprehensions that the young duke obeyed this order, which, under the circumstances, seemed to forebode ill to him. But it was too late now to avoid the storm, after having neglected to profit by the first indications of its approach.

When he entered the private cabinet of the czar, Nicholas was standing before the marble table, upon which books, papers, and charts were spread out in the greatest disorder. The emperor looked pale, and his eye was veiled as though a tear was only held back by the force of his iron will. But his countenance showed as much firmness and energy as ever before.

"Colonel," said the emperor, fixing his penetrating eye upon the frank countenance of the young duke, "you are one of the handsomest officers in Europe. I have also been told—and undoubtedly justly—that your mind is cultivated and refined, that you are a connoisseur of arts and literature, an admirer of science, and that your character bears a striking resemblance to that of your noble father and your illustrious grandmother, who, you will remember, had no more devoted admirer in Europe than my own brother, the late Czar Alexander. This is what I have been told, and, as far as I have had an opportunity to observe you, I am satisfied that I have been correctly informed. Now, Sir, will you be sincere enough to tell me, without any reserve, whether you know my daughter, the Grand Duchess Maria, and what you think of her?"

The young duke was struck with astonishment at this question, propounded to him so directly and abruptly. He had seen the princess several times; he had even spoken to her once or twice, and could not help admiring her beauty and loveliness. But the idea had never even crossed his mind that the grand duchess, who was known to be the favorite daughter of the czar, could ever be the aim of his aspirations.

"The Grand Duchess Maria, Sire!" he exclaimed, after some hesitation, while a deep blush mantled his beautiful features. "I am afraid your eye would annihilate me if I should tell you what I think of her; and yet I would die with joy if your majesty would permit me to give expression to my admiration for the grand duchess."

"That is to say that you love my daughter, duke!" said the emperor, while a kind and benevolent smile irradiated his features. And he held out the same hand from which the duke had expected to receive a decree of exile to the astonished young man, and delivered to him a commission appointing Joseph Eugene Beauharnais, Duke of Leuchtenberg, Adjutant-General of the Emperor, Commander-in-Chief of the Mounted Guards, General of Cavalry, Director of the Military Academy, President of the Academy of Arts, and Member of the Academies of Sciences at St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kasan, etc., etc. At the same time a decree of the czar conferred upon him the title of "Imperial Highness," and an annual revenue of three million rubles.

"Now, duke," said Nicholas, after the short pause during which the young man had, as in a dream, glanced over the paper, "are you now willing to leave the service of your sovereign, the King of Bavaria, to remain with us, and to become the husband of the Grand Duchess Maria?"

The young duke was too profoundly moved to make any verbal reply. But he bent a knee, and pressed his lips upon the hand of the emperor who had so generously bestowed upon him rank, wealth, and the most precious thing within his gift—the hand of his daughter.

"Ah, my son," said Nicholas, affectionately, while at last tears burst from his eyes, "you see how much I love her!" And he raised the duke from his kneeling attitude and pressed him fondly to his heart.

The next day the young grand duchess was given back to life, and a few months afterward the wedding was celebrated with the same splendor as if really the most powerful sovereign had married the most beautiful princess of Europe.

"AT HER POST."

See illustration on page 796.

THIS post our damsel of the kitchen evidently conceives to be within convenient hearing of the remonstrances which the monthly bills have called forth from the head of the family at the breakfast-table. Does the sight of her mistress's tearful face and the spoiled morning meal afford her a sweet morsel of revenge over which to gloat, in return for sundry lectures which she herself has received for the wastefulness that has swelled the sum total till the purse of her employers can bear it no longer? Or does her conscience prick her for being the cause of the blame which is thrown on her mistress? Or is she, perchance, a faithful servant, doing her best, and knowing that the wife does the same, and that the husband is one of those constitutional grumblers who hold it a duty never to pay a bill, however reasonable, without making every one about them uncomfortable by a display of petty tyranny? Whichever hypothesis may be the true one, it is certain that the husband is seriously angry, the wife deeply grieved, the servant very much enlightened about family matters, and the breakfast-table clouded by the morning thunder, which sailors assure us always betokens cloudy weather for the whole day.

THE GRAND DUKE ALEXIS.

WE give herewith a graphic sketch of the review of the New York troops by the Grand Duke Alexis, taken from the Committee Stand at the upper end of Union Square. The reception took place on Tuesday, November 22. The day was exceptionally fine, and the whole city appeared in holiday attire to welcome, not a prince, the son of an autocrat, but the representative of a power which had shown us cordial sympathy in the days of our sorest need. The Grand Duke reached New York November 18, in the Russian frigate Svetlana. He was received on the morning of the 22d on board a steamer chartered for the purpose by the Committee of Arrangements, composed of some of the most distinguished citizens of New York. The party proceeded to the city, and rode up Broadway, escorted by the militia, through crowds of curious gazers, to the Clarendon Hotel, in Fourth Avenue, from the balcony of which the royal guest of the nation reviewed the nine thousand troops who passed in array before him.

THE GRAND DUKE ALEXIS, OF RUSSIA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. D. FREDRICKS & CO.]

Prince Alexis Alexandrovitch is the third living son of the Czar Alexander II. and the Czarina Marie Alexandrowna, formerly Princess of Hesse. His chance of ruling a nation would seem, therefore, to be somewhat remote in any other nation than Russia, where the laws of regular succession are so often set at naught, and immediate heirs discarded for distant kindred. His grandfather, Nicholas, was three removes from the throne when he married the sister of William of Prussia, himself, at that time, a younger son. It is true that Nicholas's brothers were childless, whereas the Czarovitch is already a father. The Czar of Russia has been twice married, and has a numerous family. His eldest son, a young man of great promise, died a few years ago. The present Czarovitch, Alexander, is married to the Princess Dagmar, the daughter of the King of Denmark, and younger sister of the Princess of Wales. She was betrothed to his elder brother, but the betrothal was to the throne of Russia as well as the prince, and at his death it was regarded as a matter of course that she should marry his successor. She entered the Greek Church on her marriage—the religion of princes is a facile thing—and took the name of Marie Feodorowna. The second living son of the Czar is the Grand Duke Vladimir. Our Alexis comes next; then the Grand Duchess Marie; the Grand Duke Sergius, and the Grand Duke Paul.

As a child, Alexis was singularly delicate. For an hour after his birth he was believed to be dead, and was restored to life with the greatest difficulty. His grandfather, the reigning Czar Nicholas, in a transport of joy, greeted his return to life by fastening on the infant's robe the insignia of Chief of the Ekaterinienbourg Infantry, as an earnest of the honors in store for the fortunate youth. For several years his health was fragile; but he has now thoroughly outgrown this delicacy of constitution, and looks like a young Viking, six feet two in stature, with fair hair, carelessly tossed back from a high forehead, golden-brown mustache and close-clipped side whiskers, fair complexion, and sunny blue eyes. He is highly accomplished, speaks several languages, English among others, with fluency, and is accounted a good seaman and navigator. He is a sailor by profession, and holds the rank of Commander of the First Squadron of the Finland Fleet, as well as of Captain and Aid-de-camp to the Emperor. But we are glad to know that his favorite decoration is a medal presented to him for having saved a young lady from drowning, at the imminent risk of his own life. He is extremely popular with the Russian people; and the grace, courtesy, and good sense which he has displayed in his visit hither are such as to commend him to the regard of the American people.

EXAMPLE FOR THE LADIES.

MRS. E. B. DODGE, Little Rock, Ark., has used her Wheeler & Wilson Machine 14 years, doing the family sewing for 9 children (6 of them daughters), working with scarcely a day's intermission, alike satisfactorily upon the finest silks, cambric, and the coarsest soldier's clothing, without any repair. INTRODUCTION.

STONEY ALLEY.

IN the heart of a very maze of courts and lanes Stoney Alley proclaims itself. It is one of a multitude of deformed thoroughfares, which are huddled together—by whim, or caprice, or mockery—in a populous part of the city, in utter defiance of all architectural rules. It is regarded as an incontrovertible law that every thing must have a beginning, and Stoney Alley could not have been an exception to this law. It is certain that the alley and its surrounding courts and lanes must once upon a time have been a space where houses were not; where, perhaps, trees grew, and grass and flowers. But it is difficult to imagine; more difficult still to imagine how they were commenced, and by what gradual means one wretched thoroughfare was added to another, until they presented themselves to the world in the shapes and forms they now bear; resembling an ungainly body with numerous limbs, every one of which is twisted and deformed. Easier to fancy that they and all the life they bear sprang up suddenly and secretly one dark night, when Nature was in a sullen mood; and that being where they are, firmly rooted, they have remained, unchangeable and unchanging, from generation to generation. Records exist of fair islands rising from the sea, clothed with verdure and replete with animal life; but this is the bright aspect of phenomena which are regarded as delusions by many sober persons. Putting imagination aside, therefore, as a thing of small account in these days (if only for the purpose of satisfying unbelievers), and coming to plain matter of fact, it is not to be doubted that Stoney Alley and its fellows grew upon earth's surface, and did not spring up, ready-made, from below—although, truth to tell, it was worthy of such a creation. In the natural course of things, the neighborhood must have had architects and builders; but no record of them is extant, and none is necessary for the purposes of this story. Sufficient that Stoney Alley rears its ugly body—though lowly withal—in the very heart of London, and that it may be seen any day in the week in its worst aspect. It has no other: it is always at its worst.

Out of it crawl, from sunrise until midnight, men and women, who, when they emerge into the wide thoroughfare which may be regarded as its parent, not uncommonly pause for a few moments, or shade their eyes with their hands, or look about them strangely, as if they have received a surprise, or as if the different world in which they find themselves requires consideration. Into it crawl, from sunrise until midnight, the same men and women, who, it may be observed, draw their breath more freely when they are away from the wide thoroughfares, and who plunge into Stoney Alley as dusty, heat-worn travelers might plunge into a refreshing bath, where the cool waters bring relief to the parched skin. What special comfort these men and women find there, would be matter for amazement to hundreds of thousands of other men and women whose ways of life, happily, lie in pleasanter places. But Stoney Alley, to these crawlers, is Home.

Its houses could never have been bright; its pavements and roads—for it has those, though rough specimens, like their treaders—could never have been fresh. Worn-out stones and bricks, having served their time elsewhere and been cashiered, were probably brought into requisition here to commence a new and unclean life. No cart had ever been seen in Stoney Alley: it was too narrow for one. A horse had once lived there—a spare, sad, blind horse, belonging to a coster-monger, who worked his patient servant sixteen hours a day, and fed it upon Heaven knows what. It was a poor, patient creature; and as it trudged along, with its head down, it seemed by its demeanor to express an understanding of its meanness. That it was blind may have been a merciful dispensation; for, inasmuch as we do not know for certain whether such beasts can draw comparisons as well as carts, it may have been spared the pangs of envy and bitterness which it might have experienced at the sight of the well-fed horses that passed it on the road. It was as thin as a live horse well could be—so thin that a cat might have been forgiven for looking at it with contempt, as being likely to serve no useful purpose after its worldly trudgings were ended. Its mane was the raggedest mane that ever was seen; and it had no tail. What of its hair had not been appropriated by its master, the coster-monger, had been plucked out ruthlessly, from time to time, by sundry boys and girls in Stoney Alley—being incited thereto by an ingenious youth, who plaited the horse-hair into watch-guards, and who paid his young thieves in weak liquorice-water, at the rate of a tea-spoonful for every dozen hairs—long ones—from the unfortunate horse's tail. For years had this poor beast been wont to stumble over the stones in Stoney Alley when its day's work was over, and wait like a human being before its master's house for the door to open—rubbing its nose gently up and down the panels when a longer delay than usual occurred. The door being opened, it used to enter the narrow passage, and fill the house with thunderous sound as it walked into a little dirty yard, where a few charred boards (filched from a fire) had been tacked together in the form of a shed, which offered large hospitality to wind and rain. In this shed the wretched beast took its ease and enjoyed its leisure, and died one night so quietly and unexpectedly that the coster-monger, when he learned the fact in the morning, cursed it for an ungrateful "warmint," and declared that if his dumb servant had yesterday shown any stronger symptoms of dying than it had usually exhibited, he would have sold it for "two-pun-ten to Jimmy the Tinman." So deeply was he impressed by the ingratitude of the animal, that he swore he would have nothing more to do with the breed; and he bought a donkey—a donkey with such a vicious temper, and such an obstinate disposition, that the coster-monger, in his endeavors to render it submissive, became as fond of it as if it were one of his own kindred, and soon grew to treat it in exactly the same manner as he treated his wife. It would have been difficult, indeed, to decide which was the more important creature of the two—the wife or the donkey; for on two distinct occasions the coster-monger was summoned before a magistrate—once for ill-treating his wife, and once for ill-treating his donkey—and the sentence pronounced on each occasion was precisely the same. It may be noted, as a curious contrast (affording no useful lesson that I am aware of), that when the coster-monger came out of prison for ill-treating his wife, he went home and beat the poor creature unmercifully, who sat sobbing her heart out in a corner the while; and that when he came out of prison for ill-treating his donkey, he went into the rickety shed in his back-yard and belabored the obstinate brute with a heavy stick. But the donkey, cunning after its kind, watched its opportunity, and gave the coster-monger such a spiteful kick that he walked lame for three months afterward.

It would be unfair to the coster-monger not to state that he was not the only husband in those thoroughfares who was in the habit of beating his wife. He was but one of a very numerous Brute family, in whose breasts mercy finds no dwelling-place, and who marry and bring up children in their own form and likeness, morally as well as physically. It is to be lamented that when the inhumanity of the members of this prolific family is brought before the majesty of the law for judgment—as is done every day of our lives—the punishment meted out is generally light and insignificant as compared to the offense. Yet it may be answered that these wife-beaters and general Brutes were children once; and the question may be asked, Whether, taking into consideration that no opportunity was offered to them of acquiring a knowledge of a better condition of things, they are fully responsible for their actions now that they are men? We wage war against savage beasts for our own protection. But how about savage men, who might have been taught better, who might have been humanized? We press our thumb upon them, and make laws to punish the exercise of their lawless passions. But have they no case against us? Is all the right on our side, and all the wrong on theirs? That the problem is an old one, is the more to be lamented; every year, nay, every hour, its roots are striking deeper and deeper into the social stratum. The proverb, "when things are quiet, let them be quiet," is a bad proverb, like many others which are accepted as wisdom's essence. Not by a man's quiet face, but by his busy brain and heart, do we judge him. If there be benevolence in statesmanship, the problem should be considered in its entirety without delay. By-and-by it may be too late.

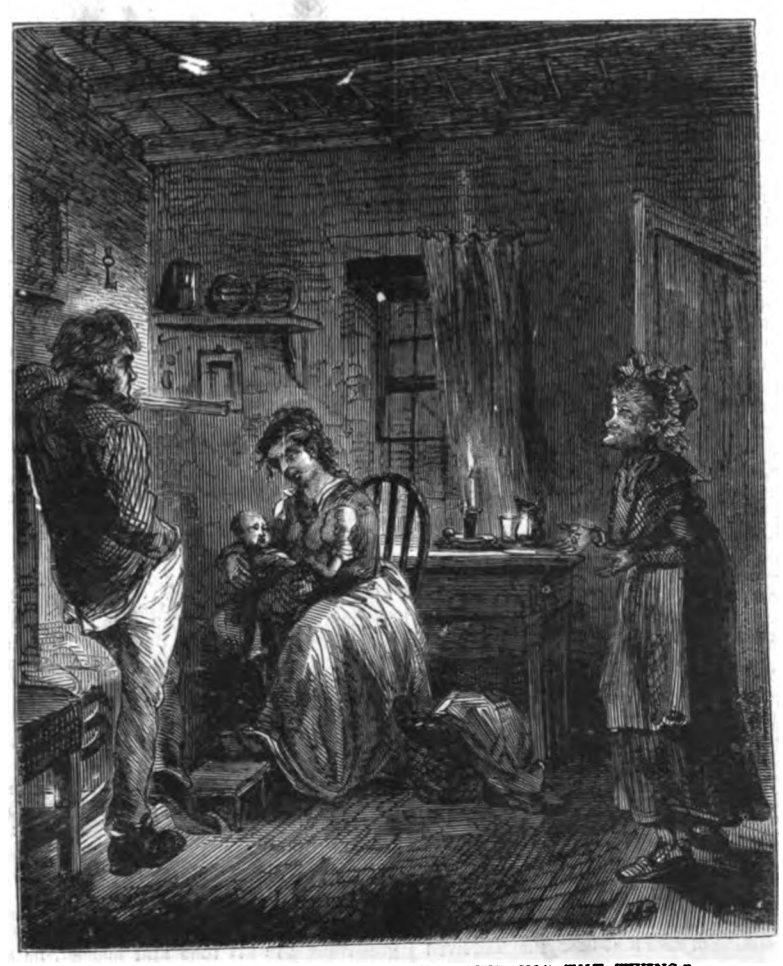
PART I.

A STRANGE EVENT OCCURS IN STONEY ALLEY.

DELICATE feather-flakes of snow were floating gently down over all the city. In some parts the snow fell white and pure, and so remained for many hours. In other parts, no sooner did it reach the ground than it was converted into slush—losing its purity, and becoming instantly defiled. This was its fate in Stoney Alley; yet even there, as it rested upon the roofs and eaves, it was fresh and beautiful for a time. In which contrasted aspects a possible suggestion might arise of the capability of certain things for grace and holiness, if they are not trodden into the mire.

An event had just occurred in Stoney Alley which was the occasion of much excitement. This was nothing more or less than the birth of twin girls in one of the meanest houses in the alley. The mother, a poor sickly woman, whose husband had deserted her, was so weakened and prostrated by her confinement, and by the want of nourishing food, that she lived but a dozen days after the birth of her babes. No one knew where the father was; he and his wife had not lived long in the neighborhood, and what was known of him was not to his credit, although with a certain class he was not unpopular. He was a lazy, surly fellow, who passed his waking hours in snarling at the better condition of things by which he was surrounded. The sight of a carriage made his blood boil with envy; notwithstanding which he took delight in walking in the better thoroughfares of the city, and feeding his soul with the bitter sight of well-dressed people and smiling faces. Then he would come back to his proper home, and snarl at society to pot-house audiences, and in his own humble room would make his unhappy wife unhappier by his reviling and discontent. He called himself a working-man, but had as much right to the title as the vagabond beggar who, dressed in broadcloth, is wheeled about in an easy-chair, in the West End of London, and who (keeping a sharp look-out for the police the while) exhibits a placard proclaiming himself to be a respectable commercial traveler, who has lost the use of his limbs. He traded upon the title, however, and made some little money out of it, hoping by-and-by to make more when he had become sufficiently notorious as a public agitator. In the mean time he (perhaps out of revenge upon society) deserted his wife when she was near her confinement, and left her to the mercy of strangers. She could not very well have fared worse than she did in that tender charge. She bore two babes, and died without a sign.

"THE LADY AND GENTLEMAN WALKED BRISKLY THROUGH THE COLD AIR."



"HER KIND-HEARTED LODGER WAS NURSING THE TWINS."

The mother was buried the day before Christmas, and the babes were left to chance charity. There were many women lodgers in the house in which the twin girls had been born; but not one of them was rich enough to take upon herself the incumbrance of two such serious responsibilities. The station-house was spoken of, the Foundling, the work-house; but not a soul was daring enough to carry out one of the suggestions. This arose from a fear of consequences—in the shape, perhaps, of an acknowledged personal responsibility, which might prove troublesome in the event of the station-house, the work-house, or the Foundling refusing to take charge of the infants. Moses in the bulrushes was not in a worse plight than these unfortunate babes in Stoney Alley.

What on earth was to be done with them? Every person in the house might get into trouble if they were left to die. The house, small as it was, accommodated five or six distinct families—each occupying a room—in addition to two bachelors—one a vagrant, the other a hawker in cheap glass-ware. These last could not be expected to assume the slightest shadow of responsibility. At length a bright idea struck a charitable woman in the house. Armed only with a calico apron with a large bib and an immense pocket in front (like a stomacher), the charitable soul went about to solicit contributions in aid of the infants. As she walked round and about the narrow alleys and courts, soliciting from every body, she made quite a stir in the neighborhood by the vigorous manner in which she rattled the coppers in her capacious pocket. A great many gave, farthings and half-pence being in the ascendant—the largest contribution being given by the bachelor vagrant above mentioned, who gave twopence with the air of a gentleman—better still, with the true spirit of one; for he gave more than he could afford, and took no glory to himself for the action. Attracted by the rattle of the coppers, a singular-looking little man, with a shriveled face, came to the door of his shop, and was instantly accosted by the kind-hearted soul.

"You'll give a copper or two, I know, Mr. Virtue," said the woman.

"Then you know more than I do," replied the man. "I don't give. I lend."

"What 'll you lend on 'em, then?" asked the woman, good-humoredly.

"Lend on what?"

"On the poor little twins that was born in our house a fortnight ago."

"Oh, that's what you're up to," exclaimed the man, whose eyes were the most extraordinary pair that ever were seen in human face—for one was as mild as London milk, and the other glared like a fury. "That's what you're up to. Collectin' for them brats afore they learn to tell lies for theirselves."

"They're as sweet a pair as ever you see," said the woman. "Just give it a thought, Mr. Virtue; you're a man o' sense—"

"Yah!" from the man, in the most contemptuous of tones, and with the fiercest of glares from his furious eye.

"There they are, without a mother, as 'elpless as 'elpless can be," persisted the woman, with a wonderful display of cheerfulness. "Come, now, you'll give a copper although you do look so grumpy."

The cynic turned into his dark shop at this last appeal, but as he turned a penny dropped from his pocket. The woman picked it up with a pleasant laugh, and, adding it to her store, proceeded on her charitable mission. But, industrious and assiduous as she was, the sum total collected was very small; about sufficient to keep the infants for half a week. The kind-hearted woman took the babes, and nursed them pro tem. She had a family of dirty children of her own, who were bringing themselves up in the gutters; for she could not attend to them, so fully was her time occupied in other ways. She could not, therefore, be expected to take permanent charge of the motherless babes. And so her husband told her, grumblingly, when he came home from his work on Christmas-eve. All that she said was, "Poor little things!" and fell to—rough as she was—detecting imaginary beauties in the babies' faces: a common trick of mothers, which no man can afford to be cross with, especially in his own wife, and the woman who has borne him children.

"Can't put 'em out in the cold, the pretty dears!" said the woman, tenderly.

"We've got enough of our own," responded her husband, not unkindly, and yet with a certain firmness; "and there's more coming—worse luck!" But these last two words he said beneath his breath, and his wife did not hear them.

"All the more reason for being kind to these," said the woman. "They'll be handsome girls when they grow up. Look'ee here, Sam, this one's got a dimple, just like—like—" Her voice trailed off softly, and her husband knew that she was thinking of their first-born, that had lived but a few weeks.

I am aware that it is the fashion with a large class to regard the portrayal of sentiment among very common people as fanciful and untrue to nature. I differ from this class, I am glad to say. True love for women, and true tenderness for children, are common to all of us, whether high or low. Cynics can not alter what is natural—in others.

The man felt kindly toward his wife and the babes, but he was not at all inclined to saddle himself with a couple of ready-made infants. He saw, however, that his wife was in a foolishly tender mood, and he let the subject drop for the present.

It may have been eight o'clock in the white night, and the bright snow was still falling like feathers from angels' wings, when, at the door of the house in which the twins had been born and the mother had died, a lady and gentleman stopped, and, obtaining entrance, asked for the landlady. Unmistakably lady and gentleman, though plainly dressed. Not highly born, but as truly lady and gentleman as the best in the land. They were strangers to the landlady of the house; but she rose the instant they entered her apartment, and remained standing during the interview.

"We have to apologize for this intrusion," commenced the lady, in a gentle voice; "but although we are strangers to you, we are not here out of rudeness."

"I'm sure of that, ma'am," replied the landlady, dusting two chairs with her apron. "Will you and the gentleman take a seat?"

"This is my husband," said the lady, seating herself. "Every year, on the anniversary of this evening, with the exception of last year, we have been in the habit of coming to some such place as this, where only poor people live—"

"Ah, you may say that, ma'am! The poorest."

—"It is so, unfortunately. God help them! Every year until the last we have been in the habit of coming to some such place in furtherance of a scheme—a whim, perhaps you'll call it—the development of which gives us the chief pleasure of our lives. We have no family of our own, no children that can properly call me mother and my husband father; so every year we adopt one and bring it up. We have six now, as many as we have been able to keep; for last year we lost part of our means through unwise speculation, for which I and my husband were equally to blame—"

"I'm sorry to hear that, ma'am," interposed the landlady, sympathizingly, standing in an attentive attitude, with the corner of her apron between her fingers.

—"And having as many little responsibilities on us as our means would enable us to take proper care of, we were unable to add another to our family of little ones. But this year a fortunate thing has occurred to us. A kind friend has placed a small sum at our disposal, which will enable us to take a seventh child, and rear it in comfort and respectability."

"And a lucky child that seventh 'ull be," remarked the landlady. "I'm a seventh child myself, and so was my mother before me, and we was both born on a 7th."

"Every child we have is an orphan, without father or mother, which we believe to be necessary for the proper furtherance of our scheme. We feed them and nourish them properly—indeed, as if they were really our own—and when they are old enough, they will be put to some respectable occupation which will render them independent of the world. Among the many poor children round about here, do you know of one who, having no natural protectors, would be bettered by coming under our charge? These letters will satisfy you of our fitness for the task, and that we are in earnest."

"Lord bless me!" exclaimed the landlady, impelled to that exclamation by sudden thought of the twins up stairs, and not casting a glance at the papers which were placed in her hands. "You don't mean what you say?"

"Indeed we do. You will be kind enough to understand that we do not desire to take a child who has parents living, but one whom hard circumstances has placed in the world friendless and alone. These poor courts and alleys abound in children—"

"Ah, that they do; and a nice pest they are, a many on 'em. They're as thick as fleas."

—"And at this season it is good to think of them, and to try to do some little thing in their behalf. It is but little that we can do—very, very little. Do you know of such a child as we seek for now?"

"A girl?"

"A girl or boy."

"God Almighty bless you, ma'am!" cried the landlady. "Stop here a minute, and I'll let you know."

She ran in haste up stairs to where her kind-hearted lodger was nursing the twins.

"I beg you a thousand pardons, Mrs. Manning," she said, panting, "and you too, Mr. Manning; and I wish you a merry Christmas, and many on 'em! I'm that out of breath, and that astonished, that I don't know if I'm on my head or my heels. Stay a minute, my good souls; I'll be back in a jiffy."

With that she ran out of the room and down stairs to assure herself that her visitors had not flown, or that she had not been dreaming. Having satisfied herself, she ran up stairs again, and sat down in a more panting state than before.

"I thought I was dreaming, and that they was apparitions!" she gasped.

Mr. Manning, being one of those Englishmen who look upon their habitations as their castles, was inclined to resent these intrusions. Unconsciously throwing a large amount of aggressiveness in his tone and manner, he asked his landlady if he owed her any rent, and received for answer, No, that he didn't, and the expression of a wish that every body was like him in this respect.

"Very well, then," said Mr. Manning, not at all mollified by the landlady's compliment, and speaking so surlily that (as the landlady afterward said, in relating the circumstance), if it had not been for her being out of breath, and for thinking of those two precious babes, he would have "put her back up" there and then—"if I don't owe you any thing, what do you mean by coming bouncing into my room in this manner?"

"I asks your pardon," said the landlady, with dignity; but instantly softening, as she thought of her visitors down stairs; "but you've got a 'art in your bosom, and you've got the feelings of a father. The long and the short of it is"—and here she proceeded to explain the visit she had had, and the object of her visitors. "Ah, Mr. Manning," she continued, following the direction of his eyes toward the two babes lying in his wife's lap, "you've got the same idea as I had in coming up here. Here's these two blessed babes, with no mother, and no father to speak of; for I don't believe he'll ever turn up. What's to become of 'em? Who's to take care of 'em? I'm sure you can't."

"No, that I can't; and don't intend to."

"And no one expects you, Sir. You've got a big enough family of your own. Well, here's this lady and gentleman setting down stairs this blessed minute as wants a child, and as 'll do what's right and proper by it."

"But there's a pair of 'em. Won't they take the two?"

"One they said, and one they mean. They can't hardly afford that, they said. And I'm as certain as I am that I'm setting here, that if they knew there was two of 'em, they wouldn't part 'em for the world. No, they'd go somewhere else; and the chance 'd be lost."

"But they want a child that ain't got no father nor mother. Now these young uns have a father; and that you know."

"No, I don't; I don't know nothing of the kind. 'Tain't the first story I've told by a many," said the landlady, in answer to Mr. Manning's look of astonishment; "and I don't mind telling this one to do a little baby good."

"What's to become of the other?"

"We'll look after her between us. One 'll take her one day, and one another. Lord bless you, Mr. Manning, we shall be able to manage."

"And if the father comes back?"

"I'll get the lady's address and give it to him; and then he can do as he likes."

"It's the best thing that can be done," said Mr. Manning; "though I've nothing to do with it, mind you; it's none of my business. I've got troubles enough of my own. But it ain't every young un that gets such a chance."

"No, that it ain't;" and the landlady pulled her chair close to that of Mrs. Manning. "Which shall it be, my dear?"

This proved to be a very difficult question to answer. First they decided that it was to be this one, then that; then soft-hearted Mrs. Manning began to cry, and said it was a sin to part them. And the babes lay sleeping unconsciously the while this momentous point was being discussed, the decision of which might condemn one to want and dirt and misery—to crime, perhaps—and the other to a career where good opportunity might produce a happy and virtuous life. At length it was decided, and one was chosen; but when the landlady prepared to take the child, she found that the fingers of the babes were tightly interlaced; so she left them in Mrs. Manning's lap, with instructions to get the chosen one ready, and went down to her visitors.

"Poor child!" said the lady, at the conclusion of the landlady's recital; "and the mother was only buried yesterday!"

"Only yesterday, ma'am," responded the landlady, "and the dear little thing is left without a friend. There's not one of us that wouldn't be glad to take care of it; but we're too poor, ma'am; and that's the fact."

"The child's younger than we could have wished," mused the lady, with a glance at her husband; "but it would seem like a cruel desertion, now that we have heard its sad story."

Her husband nodded, and the landlady, keenly watchful, said, eagerly:

"I'll bring it down to you, ma'am. One of the lodgers is nursing it; but her husband's grumbling at her, and making her miserable about it. He says he's got enough of his own; and so he has."

By this time Mrs. Manning had the baby ready—she had dressed the child in some old baby-clothes of her own—and before she let it go out of her arms, she said, as if the little thing could understand:

"Kiss sister, baby. You'll never see her again, perhaps; and if you do, you won't know her."

She placed their lips close together; and at that moment they opened their eyes, and smiled prettily on one another. The man and the two women stood by, gazing earnestly at the babes. Tears were in Mrs. Manning's eyes as she witnessed the strange parting; the landlady was silent and pensive; and the man, with his hands behind him, seemed to be suddenly engrossed in the consideration of some social problem, which he found too perplexing for him. His wife raised the fortunate babe to his face.

"A happy New-Year to you, little un," said the not unkindly man, as he kissed the child.

"Suppose they were our'n, Sam," said his wife, softly and tearfully; "we shouldn't like this to happen."

"But they're not our'n," replied her husband; "and that makes all the difference."

And yet there was a wistful expression on his face, as the landlady took the baby out of the room.

"I've kept the prettiest one," his wife whispered to him—"the one with the dimple."

The lady and gentleman—she with her new charge wrapped in her warm shawl, and pressed closely to her bosom — walked briskly through the cold air toward their home, which lay in a square about a mile from Stoney Alley. In the centre of the square was a garden, the wood-growth in which, though bare of leaves, looked as beautiful in their white mantle as ever they had done in their brightest summer. The snow-lined trees stood out boldly yet gracefully, and their every branch, fringed in purest white, was an emblem of loveliness. They gleamed grandly in the moon's light, mute witnesses of the greatness of Him whose lightest work is an evidence of perfect wisdom and goodness.

HOW SHE ACQUIRED THE NAME OF BLADE-O'-GRASS.

THUS, while one little babe was tended and watched by benevolent hands and eyes, the fate of the other—the prettier one, she with the unfortunate dimple—was intrusted to the shapeless hands of chance. To such tender care as had happily fallen to its lot the fortunate one may be left for a time. Turn we to the other, and watch its strange bringing up.

Proverbially, too many cooks spoil the broth; and this forlorn babe was left to the care of too many cooks, who, however, in this instance, did not spoil the broth by meddling with it, but by almost utterly neglecting it. The landlady's declaration that "We'll look after her between us; one 'll take her one day, and one another," although uttered in all sincerity, turned out badly in its application. What is every body's business is nobody's business, and for the most part the babe was left to take care of herself. For a little while Mrs. Manning was the child's only friend; but in the course of a couple of months she fulfilled her husband's apprehension, and added another bantling to his already overstocked quiver. This new arrival (which, it must be confessed, was not received with gratitude by its father) was so fractious, and so besieged by a complication of infantile disorders, that all Mrs. Manning's spare moments were fully occupied, and she had none to devote to other people's children. The motherless child threatened to fare badly indeed. But now and again a mother who had lost her offspring came to the little stranger and suckled her; so that she drew life from many bosoms, and may be said to have had at least a score of wet-nurses. And thus she grew up almost literally in the gutters, no one owning her, no one really caring for her; and yet she throve, as weeds thrive—while her sister, not a mile away, throve, in the care of kind friends, as flowers thrive. Born in equality, with the same instincts for good and evil, with the same capacity for good and evil, equally likely to turn out good or bad, should it have been left entirely to chance that one might live to prove a blessing, and the other a curse, to society? But so it was.

One of the most curious circumstances connected with the little outcast was that she was not known by any settled name. It grew to be a fashion to call her by all sorts of names—now Polly, now Sally, now Young Hussy, now Little Slut, and by a dozen others, not one of which remained to her for any length of time. But when she was three years of age an event occurred which played the part of godmothers and godfathers to her, and which caused her to receive a title by which she was always afterward known.

There was not a garden in Stoney Alley. Not within the memory of living man had a flower been known to bloom there. There were many poor patches of ground, crowded as the neighborhood was, which might have been devoted to the cultivation of a few bright petals; but they were allowed to lie fallow, festering in the sun. Thought of graceful form and color had never found expression there. Strange, therefore, that one year, when Summer was treading close upon the heel of Spring, sending warm, sweet winds to herald her coming, there should spring up, in one of the dirtiest of all the back-yards in Stoney Alley, two or three blades of grass. How they came there was a mystery. No human hand was accountable for their presence. It may be that a bird, flying over the place, had mercifully dropped a seed, or that a kind wind had borne it to the spot. But however they came, there they were, these blades of grass, peeping up from the ground shyly and wonderingly, and giving promise of bright color even in the midst of the unwholesome surroundings. Our little castaway—she was no better—now three years of age, was sprawling in this dirty back-yard with a few other children—all of them regular students of Dirt College. Attracted by the little bit of color, she crawled to the spot where it shone in the light, and straightway fell to watching it, and inhaling, quite unconsciously, whatever of grace it possessed. Once or twice she touched the tender blades, and seemed to be pleased to find them soft and pliant. The other children, delighted at having the monopoly of a green that ran through the yard, did not disturb her: and so she remained during the day, watching and wondering, and fell asleep by the side of the blades of grass, and dreamed, perhaps, of brighter colors and more graceful forms than had ever yet found place in her young imagination. The next day she made her way again to the spot, and seeing that the blades had grown a little, wondered and wondered, and unconsciously exercised that innate sense of worship of the beautiful which is implanted in every nature, and which causes the merest babes to rejoice at light and shapes of beauty and harmony of sound. What is more wonderful in the eyes of a babe than vivid color or light, however kindled? what more sweet to its senses than that perfect harmony of sound which falls upon its ears as the mother sings softly, and lulls her darling to sleep? This latter blessing had never fallen to the lot of our child; but color and light were given to her, and she was grateful for them. She grew to love these emerald leaves, and watched them day after day, until the women round about observed and commented upon her strange infatuation. But one evening, when the leaves were at their brightest and strongest, a man, running hastily through the yard, crushed the blades of grass beneath his heel, and tore them from the earth. The grief of the child was intense. She cast a passionate yet bewildered look at the man, and picking up the torn, soiled blades, put them in the breast of her ragged frock, in the belief that warmth would bring them back to life. She went to bed with the mangled leaves in her hot hand; and when she looked at them the next morning, they bore no resemblance to the bright leaves which had been such a delight to her. She went to the spot where they had grown, and cried without knowing why; and the man who had destroyed the leaves happening to pass at the time, she struck at him with her little fists. He pushed her aside rather roughly with his foot; and Mrs. Manning, seeing this, and having also seen the destruction of the leaves, and the child's worship of them, blew him up for his unkindness. He merely laughed, and said he wouldn't have done it if he had looked where he was going, and that it was a good job for the child that she wasn't a blade o' grass herself, or she might have been trodden down with the others. The story got about the alley, and one and another, at first in fun or derision, began to call the child Little Blade-o'-Grass, until, in course of time, it came to be recognized as her regular name, and she was known by it all over the neighborhood. So, being thus strangely christened, Little Blade-o'-Grass grew in years and in ignorance, and became a worthy member of Dirt College, in which school she was matriculated for the battle of life.

THE LEGEND OF THE TIGER.

At a very early age indeed was Blade-o'-Grass compelled to begin the battle of life. Her greatest misfortune was that, as she grew in years, she grew strong. Had she been a weakly little thing, some one might have taken pity on her, and assumed the responsibility of maintaining her. The contingency was a remote one: but all chance of benefiting by it was utterly destroyed, because she was strong and hardy. She may be said to have had some sort of a home up to the time that she attained the age of nine years; for a corner for her to sleep in was always found in the house in which she was born. But about that time certain important changes took place, which materially affected her, although she had no hand in them. The landlady gave up the house, and some one else took it, and turned it into a shop. The lodgers all received notice to leave, and went elsewhere to live. A great slice of luck fell to the share of Mr. Manning. An uncle whom he had never seen died in a distant land, and left his money to his relatives; and a shrewd lawyer made good pickings by hunting up nephews and nieces of the deceased. Among the rest he hunted up Mr. Manning, and one day he handed his client a small sum of money. Mr. Manning put his suddenly acquired wealth to a good purpose—he got passage in a government emigrant ship, and, with his wife and large family, bade good-by forever to Stoney Alley. He left the country—as hundreds and thousands of others have done—with a bitter feeling in his heart because he was not able to stop in it and earn a decent livelihood; but—as hundreds and thousands of others have done—he lived this feeling down, and in his new home, with better prospects and better surroundings, talked of his native land—meaning Stoney Alley—as the "old country," in terms of affection, and as if he had been treated well in it. It will be easily understood that when Blade-o'-Grass lost Mrs. Manning, she lost her best friend.

To say that she passed an easy life up to this point of her career would be to state what is false. The child was in continual disgrace, and scarcely a day passed that was not watered with her tears. Blows, smacks, and harsh words were administered to her freely, until she grew accustomed to them, and they lost their moral force. She deserved them, for she was the very reverse of a good little girl. In a great measure her necessities made her what she was, and no counteracting influence for good approached her. If she were sent for beer, she would stop at corners, and taste and sip, and bring home short measure. There was something fearful in her enjoyment; but she had no power nor desire to resist the temptation. No tragedy queen, before the consummation of the final horror, ever looked round with more watchful, wary, fearsome gaze than did Blade-o'-Grass when, having nerved her soul to take a sip of beer, she stopped at a convenient corner, or in the shadow of a dark door-way, to put her desire into execution. And then she was always breaking things. The mugs she let fall would have paved Stoney Alley. But there was a greater temptation than beer: Bread. If she were sent for a half-quartern loaf, she would not fail to dig out with liberal fingers the soft portions between the crusts, and eagerly devour them. Even if she had not been hungry—which would have been a white-letter day in her existence—she would have done from habit what she almost invariably was urged to do by the cravings of her stomach. And about that unfortunate stomach of hers, calumnies were circulated and believed in. So persistent an eater was Blade-o'-Grass, so conscientious a devourer of any thing that, legitimately or otherwise, came in her way—quality being not of the slightest object—that a story got about that she had "something" in her inside, some living creature of a ravenous nature, that waited for the food as she swallowed it, and instantly devoured it for its own sustenance. Such things had been known of. At some remote period a girl in the neighborhood—whose personality was never traced, but whom every body believed in—had had such an animal—a few called it a "wolf," but the majority insisted that it was a "tiger"—growing inside of her, and this animal, so the story went, grew and grew, and fed upon the girl's life till it killed her. The "tiger" had been found alive after the girl's death, and, having been purchased by some one for a fabulous price, was embalmed in a bottle in a great museum, of which nobody knew the name or the whereabouts. As an allegory, this "tiger" might have served to illustrate the mournful story of the lives of Blade-o'-Grass and thousands of her comrades—it might have served, indeed, to point a bitter moral; but there was nothing allegorical about the inhabitants of Stoney Alley. They only dealt in hard matter-of-fact, and the mythical story was fully believed in; and being applied to the case of Blade-o'-Grass, became a great terror to her. Many persons found delight in tormenting the helpless child about her "tiger," and for a long time the slightest allusion to it was sufficient to cause her the most exquisite anguish, in consequence of certain malevolent declarations that she ought to be cut open and have the tiger taken out of her. Indeed, one miserable old fellow, who kept a rag shop, and who had in his window two or three dust-coated bottles containing commonplace reptiles preserved in spirits of wine, took a malicious pleasure in declaring that the operation ought to be really performed upon Blade-o'-Grass, and that, in the interests of science, she ought not to be allowed to live. It was the cruelest of sport thus to torture the poor child; for the simple fact was that Blade-o'-Grass was nearly always hungry. It was nature tugging at her stomach—not a tiger.

The very first night of Mrs. Manning's departure, Blade-o'-Grass found herself without a bed. With a weary, wretched sense of desolation upon her, she lingered about the old spot where she used to sleep, and even ventured to enter at the back of the house, when the sharp "Come, get out o' this!" of the new proprietor sent her flying away. She belonged to nobody, and nobody cared for her; so she wandered and lingered about until all the lights in the shops and houses were out. She had gleaned some small pleasure in watching these lights; she had found comfort in them: and when they were all extinguished and she was in darkness, she trembled under the impulse of a vague terror. She did not cry; it was not often now that she called upon the well of tender feelings where tears lay; but she was terrified. There was not a star in the sky to comfort her. She was in deep darkness, body and soul. How many others are there at this present moment in the same terrible condition?

Too full of fear to stand upright, she crept along the ground slowly, feeling her way by the walls, stopping every now and then to gather fresh courage, at which time she tried to shut out her fears by cowering close to the flag-stones and hiding her face in her ragged frock. She had a purpose in view. She had thought of a refuge where she would find some relief from the terrible shadows. Toward that refuge she was creeping now. It was a long, long time before she reached her haven—a crazy old lamp-post, the dim light of which was in keeping with the general poverty of its surroundings. At the foot of this lamp-post, clasping it as if it were the symbol of a sacred refuge, Blade-o'-Grass looked up at the light in an agony of speechless gratitude, and then, wearied almost to a state of unconsciousness, coiled herself up into a ball, like a hedgehog, and soon was fast asleep.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.

What followed? Remorseless Time pursued his way, and the minutes, light to some, heavy to some, leaving in their track a train of woe and joy and grief and happiness; the leaden minutes, the golden minutes, flew by until daylight came and woke the sleeping child. Unwashed—but that was her chronic condition, and did not affect her—forlorn, uncared-for, Blade-o'-Grass looked round upon her world, and rubbed her eyes, and yawned; then, after a time, rose to her feet, and cast quick, eager glances about her. The tiger in her stomach was awake and stirring, and Blade-o'-Grass had no food to give it to satisfy its cravings. She prowled up and down, and round and about the dirty courts, in search of something to eat; any thing would have more than contented her—mouldy crust, refuse food; but the stones of Stoney Alley and its fellows were merciless, and no manna fell from heaven to bless the famished child. She would have puzzled the wisest philosopher in social problems if he were not utterly blinded by theory; for, looking at her from every aspect, and taking into account not only that she was endowed with mental, moral, and physical faculties, but that she was a human being with a soul "to be saved," he could have produced but one result from her—a yearning for food. He could have struck no other kind of fire from out of this piece of flint. What resemblance did Blade-o'-Grass bear to that poetical image which declares her to be noble in reason, infinite in faculty, express and admirable in form and bearing—like an angel in action, like a god in apprehension? The beauty of the world, the paragon of animals! Perhaps it will be best for us not to examine too curiously, for there is shame in the picture of this child-girl prowling about for food. Poor Blade-o'-Grass! with every minute the tiger in her stomach grew more rabid, and tore at her vitals tigerishly. In the afternoon she found a rotten apple in the gutter, and she stooped and picked it up, joy glistening in her eyes. It was a large apple, fortunately, and she devoured it eagerly, and afterward chewed the stalk. That was all the food she got that day; and when night came, and she had watched the lights out, she coiled herself up into a ball by the side of her lamp-post again and slept, and awoke in the morning sick with craving. Yesterday's experience whispered to her not to look about for food in Stoney Alley; and she walked with painful steps into the wider thoroughfare, and stopped for a few minutes to recover herself from her astonishment at the vast world in which she found herself. She would have been content to stop there all the day, but that the tiger cried for food, and she cried for food in sympathy with the tiger. Keeping her eyes fixed upon the ground, and never once raising her pitiful face to the faces that flashed past her hither and thither, she faltered onward for a hundred yards or so, and then, in a frightened manner, retraced her steps so that she should not lose herself. "Give me food!" cried the tiger, and "Give me food!" cried Blade-o'-Grass, from the innermost depths of her soul. At about ten o'clock in the morning her cry was answered; she saw a cats'-meat man with a basketful of skewered meat hanging upon his arm. Instinctively she followed him, and watched the cats running to the doors at the sound of his voice, and waiting with arched backs and dilating eyes for his approach. Blade o'-Grass wished with all her heart and soul that she were a cat, so that she might receive her portion upon a skewer; but no such happiness was hers. She followed the man wistfully and hungeringly, until he stopped at the door of a house where there were evidently arrears of account to be settled. He placed his basket upon the door-step, and went into the passage to give some change to the woman of the house. Here was an opportunity for Blade-o'-Grass. She crept stealthily and fearfully toward the basket, and, snatching up two portions of cats'-meat, ran for her life, with her stolen food hidden in her tattered frock—ran until she reached Stoney Alley, where she sank to the ground with her heart leaping at her throat, and where, after recovering her breath, she devoured her ill gotten meat with unbounded satisfaction. She had no idea that she had done a wrong thing. She was hungry, and had simply taken food when the opportunity presented itself. The fear by which she had been impressed had not sprung from any moral sense, but partly from the thought that the man would hurt her if he caught her taking his property, and partly from the thought (more agonizing than the other) that she might be prevented from carrying out her design. The next day she watched for and followed the cats'-meat man again, and again was successful in obtaining a meal; and so on for a day or two afterward. But the food was not overnice, and the tiger whispered to her that a change would be agreeable. Success made her bold, and she looked about her for other prey. Her first venture, after the cats'-meat man lost her patronage, was an old woman who kept an apple stall, and who went to sleep as regularly as clock-work every afternoon at three o'clock, and woke at five. But even in her sleep this old apple-woman seemed to be wary, and now and then would mumble out, with drowsy energy, "Ah, would yer? I sees yer!" as if the knowledge that she was surrounded by suspicious characters whose mouths watered for her fruit had eaten into her soul. But as these exclamations to terrify poachers were mumbled out when the old woman really was in an unconscious state, she fell an easy victim to Blade-o'-Grass. She was a great treasure to the little girl, for she dealt in nuts and oranges as well as apples. Then there was a woman who sold a kind of cake designated "jumbles"—a wonderful luxury, price four a penny. She also fell a victim, and between one and another Blade-o'-Grass managed to pick up a precarious living, and in a few months became as nimble and expert a little thief as the sharpest policeman would wish to make an example of. She was found out, of course, sometimes, and was cuffed and beaten; but she was never given in charge. The persons from whom she stole seemed to be aware of the hapless condition of the child, and had mercy upon her; indeed, many of them had at one time or another of their lives known what it was to suffer the pangs of hunger.

Incredible as it may sound, Blade-o'-Grass still had one friend left. His name was Tom Beadle. He was some five years older than Blade o'-Grass, but looked so delicate and sickly, and was of such small proportions, that they might have been taken for pretty nearly the same age. Delicate and sickly as he looked, he was as sharp as a weasel. He had a mother and a father, who, when they were not in prison, lived in Stoney Alley; but they, being a drunken and dissolute pair, did not trouble themselves about their son. So he had to shift for himself, and in course of time became cunningest of the cunning. Between him and Blade-o'-Grass there had grown a closer intimacy than she had contracted with any other of her associates, and whenever they met they stopped to have a chat. Blade-o'-Grass had a genuine affection for him, for he had often given her a copper, and quite as often had shared his meal with her.

A few months after the change for the worse in the prospects of Blade-o'-Grass, Tom Beadle, lounging about in an idle humor, saw her sitting on the curb-stone, with her eyes fixed upon the old apple-woman, who had begun to nod. There was something in the gaze of Blade-o'-Grass that attracted Tom Beadle's attention, and he set himself to watch. Presently the girl shifted a little nearer to the fruit stall—a little nearer—nearer, until she was quite close. Her hand stole slowly toward the fruit, and a pear was taken, then another. Tom Beadle laughed; but looked serious immediately afterward, for Blade-o'-Grass was running away as fast as her legs could carry her. Assuring himself that there was no cause for alarm, Tom Beadle ran after her, and placed his hand heavily on her shoulder. She had heard the step behind her, and her heart almost leaped out of her throat; but when she felt the hand upon her shoulder, she threw away the stolen fruit, and fell to the ground in an agony of fear.

"Git up, you little fool," exclaimed Tom Beadle. "What are you frightened at?" Before he said this, however, he picked up the pears and put them in his pocket.

"Oh, Tom!" cried Blade-o'-Grass, the familiar tones falling upon her ears like sweetest music; "I thought it was somebody after me."

Then Tom told her that he ran after her to stop her running, and instructed her that it was the very worst of policy, after she had "prigged" any thing, to run away when nobody was looking. And this was the first practical lesson in morals that Blade-o'-Grass had received.

"But, I say, Bladergrass," observed Tom, "I didn't know as you'd taken to prig."

"I can't help it, Tom. The tiger's always at me."

Tom implicitly believed in the tiger story.

"Well, that's all right," said Tom; "only take care—and don't you run away agin when nobody's a-lookin'."

Months passed, and Blade-o'-Grass lived literally from hand to mouth. But times grew very dull; her hunting-ground was nearly worked out, and she was more often hungry than not. One day she hadn't been able to pick up a morsel of food, and had had insufficient for many previous days. The day before she had had but one scanty meal, so that it is not difficult to imagine her miserable condition. Her guardian angel, Tom Beadle, discovered her crouching against a wall, with fear and despair in her face and eyes. He knew well enough what was the matter, but he asked her, for form's sake, and she returned him the usual answer, while the large tears rolled down her cheeks into her mouth.

It so happened that Tom Beadle had been out of luck that day. He hadn't a copper in his pocket. He felt about for one, nevertheless, and finding none, whistled—curiously enough, the "Rogue's March"—more in perplexity than from surprise.

"Ain't yer had any think to eat, Bladergrass?"

"Not a blessed bite," was the answer.

It was about five o'clock in the evening; there were at least a couple of hours to sunset. An inspiration fell upon Tom Beadle, and his countenance brightened.

"Come along o' me," he said.

Blade-o'-Grass placed her hand unhesitatingly in his, and they walked toward the wealthier part of the City, until they came to a large space surrounded by great stone buildings. In the centre of the space was a statue. Blade-o'-Grass had never been so far from her native place as this. The crowds of people hurrying hither and thither, as if a moment's hesitation would produce a fatal result, the apparently interminable strings of carts and cabs and wagons and omnibuses issuing from half a dozen thoroughfares, and so filling the roads with moving lines and curves and angles that it seemed to be nothing less than miraculous how a general and disastrous crash was avoided, utterly bewildered little Blade-o'-Grass, and caused her for a moment to be oblivious of the cravings of the tiger in her stomach.

"Now, look 'ere, Bladergrass," whispered Tom Beadle; "you keep tight 'old of my 'and; if any body arks yer, I'm yer brother a-dyin' of consumption. I'm a-dyin' by inches, I am."

Forthwith he called into his face such an expression of utter, helpless woe and misery, that Blade-o'-Grass cried out in terror,

"Oh, what's up, Tom? Oh, don't, Tom, don't!" really believing that her companion had been suddenly stricken.

"Don't be stoopid!" remonstrated Tom, smiling at her to reassure her, and then resuming his woe-begone expression; "I'm only a-shammin'."

With that he sank upon the bottom of a grand flight of stone steps, dragging Blade-o'-Grass down beside him. There they remained, silent, for a few moments, and perhaps one in a hundred of the eager, bustling throng turned to give the strange pair a second glance; but before sympathy had time to assume practical expression, a policeman came up to them and bade them move on. Tom rose to his feet, wearily and painfully, and slowly moved away; a snail in its last minutes of life could scarcely have moved more slowly, if it had moved at all. He took good care to keep tight hold of the hand of Blade-o'-Grass, lest she should be pushed from him, and be lost in the crowd. A notable contrast were these two outcasts—she, notwithstanding her fright and the pangs of hunger by which she was tormented, strong-limbed and sturdy for her age; and he, drooping, tottering, with a death-look upon his face, as if every moment would be his last. You would have supposed that his mind was a blank to all but despair, and that he was praying for death; but the cunning and hypocrisy of Tom Beadle were not to be measured by an ordinary standard. He was as wide awake as a weasel, and although his eyes were to the ground, he saw every thing that surged around him, and was as ready to take advantage of an opportunity as the sharpest rascal in London. As he and his companion made their way through the busy throng, they attracted the attention of two men—both of them elderly men, of some sixty years of age; one, well dressed, with a bright eye and a benevolent face; the other, poorly but not shabbily dressed, and with a face out of which every drop of the milk of human kindness seemed to have been squeezed when he was a young man. When he looked at you, it appeared as if you were undergoing the scrutiny of two men; for one of his eyes had a dreadfully fixed and glassy stare in it, and the other might have been on fire, it was so fiercely watchful.

Now, overpowered as Tom Beadle might have been supposed to be in his own special ills and cares, he saw both these men, as he saw every thing else about him, and a sly gleam of recognition passed from his eyes to the face of the odd-looking and poorly dressed stranger; it met with no response, however. The next moment Tom raised his white, imploring face to that of the better-dressed man, whose tender heart was stirred by pity at the mute appeal. He put his hand in his pocket, but seemed to be restrained from giving; some impulse within him whispered, "Don't!" while his heart prompted him to give. But the struggle was not of long duration. The words, "Indiscriminate charity again," fell from his lips, and looking round cautiously, as if he were about to commit a felony, he hastily approached close to the two children, and, with an air of guilt, slipped a shilling in Tom Beadle's hand. After which desperate deed he turned to fly from the spot, when he saw something in the face of the odd-looking man (who had been watching the comedy with curious interest) which made him first doubtful, then angry. Although they were strangers, he was impelled to speak, and his kind nature made him speak in a polite tone.

"Dreadful sight, Sir, dreadful sight," he said, pointing to the creeping forms of Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass. "A penny can't be thrown away there, eh?"

The odd-looking man shrugged his shoulders. The shrug conveyed to the benevolent stranger this meaning: "You are an imbecile; you are an old fool; you are not fit to be trusted alone." It was the most expressive of shrugs.

"I suppose you mean to say I've been imposed upon!" exclaimed the benevolent stranger, hotly.

The odd-looking man chuckled enjoyably, and perked up his head at the questioner in curiosity, as a magpie with its eye in a blaze might have done. But he said nothing. His silence exasperated the benevolent alms-giver, who exclaimed, "You've no humanity, Sir; no humanity;" and turned on his heel. But turned round again immediately and said, "I've no right to say that, Sir—no right, and I beg your pardon. But d'ye mean to tell me that that lad is an impostor, Sir? If you do, I deny it, Sir; I deny it! D'ye mean to say that I've been taken in, and that those two children are not—not HUNGRY, Sir?"

Some words seemed to be rising to the odd-looking man's lips, but he restrained the utterance of them, and closed his lips with a snap. He touched his shabby cap with an air of amusement, and turned away, chuckling quietly; and the next minute the two men were struggling in different directions with the human tide that spread itself over all the city.

In the mean time, Tom Beadle, keeping up the fiction of "dyin' by inches," crept slowly away. He had not seen the coin which had been slipped into his hand, but he knew well enough by the feel that it was a shilling. "A regular slice o' luck," he muttered to himself, beneath his breath. When they had crept on some fifty yards, he quickened his steps, and Blade-o'-Grass tried to keep up with him. But all at once her hands grew quite cold, and a strong trembling took possession of her.

"Come along, Bladergrass," urged Tom, in his anxiety to get safely away; "'ow you creep!"

The child made another effort, but, as if by magic, the streets and the roar in them vanished from her sight and hearing, and she would have fallen to the ground but for Tom's arm thrown promptly round her poor fainting form.

Near to them was a quiet court—so still and peaceful that it might have hidden in a country place where Nature was queen—and Tom Beadle, who knew every inch of the ground, bore her thither. His heart grew cold as he gazed upon her white face.

"I wish I may die," he muttered to himself, in a troubled voice, "if she don't look as if she was dead. Bladergrass! Bladergrass!" he called.

She did not answer him. Not a soul was near them. Had it not been that he liked the child, and that, little villain as he was, he had some humanity in him—for her at least—he would have run away. He stood quiet for a few moments, debating within himself what he had best do. He knelt over her, and put his lips to hers, and whispered, coaxingly, "Come along, Bladergrass. Don't be a little fool. Open your eyes, and call Tom."

The warmth of his face and lips restored her to consciousness. She murmured, "Don't—don't! Let me be!"

"What's the matter, Bladergrass?" he whispered. "It's me—Tom! Don't you know me?"

"Oh, let me be, Tom!" implored Blade-o'-Grass. "Let me be! The tiger's a-eatin' the inside out o' me, and I'm a-dyin'."

She closed her eyes again, and the sense of infinite peace that stole upon her, as she lay in this quiet court, was like heaven to her, after the wild roar of steps and sounds in which a little while since she had been ingulfed. Had she died at that moment, it would have been happier for her; but at whose door could her death have been laid?

Tom Beadle, whispering hurriedly and anxiously, and certainly quite superfluously, "Lay still, Bladergrass! I'll be back in a minute," ran off to buy food, and soon returned with it. He had a little difficulty in rousing her, but when she began to taste the food, and, opening her eyes, saw the store which Tom had brought, she tore at it almost deliriously, crying out of thankfulness as she ate. Tom was sufficiently rewarded by seeing the color return to her cheeks; before long Blade-o'-Grass was herself again, and was laughing with Tom.

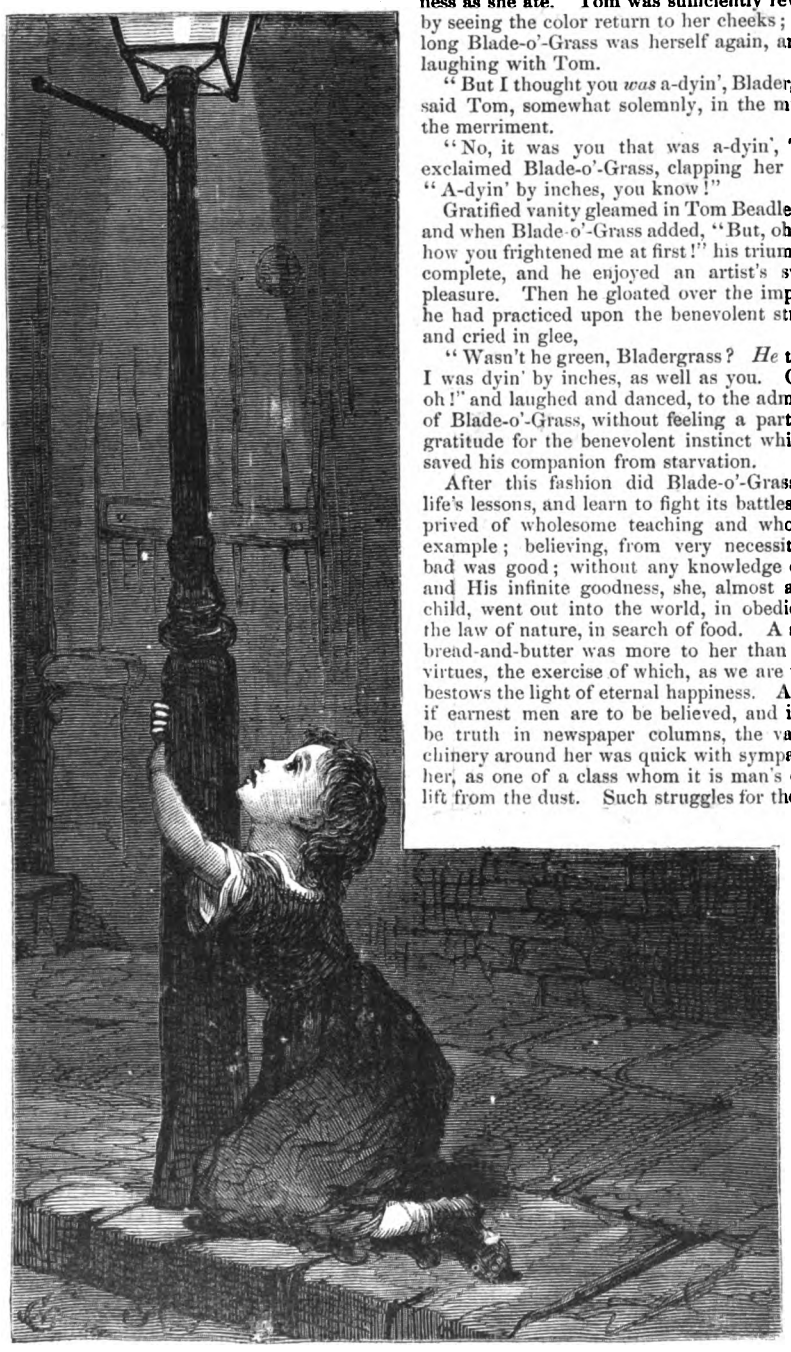
"But I thought you was a-dyin', Bladergrass," said Tom, somewhat solemnly, in the midst of the merriment.

"No, it was you that was a-dyin', Tom!" exclaimed Blade-o'-Grass, clapping her hands. "A-dyin' by inches, you know!"

Gratified vanity gleamed in Tom Beadle's eyes, and when Blade-o'-Grass added, "But, oh, Tom, how you frightened me at first!" his triumph was complete, and he enjoyed an artist's sweetest pleasure. Then he gloated over the imposition he had practiced upon the benevolent stranger, and cried in glee,

"Wasn't he green, Bladergrass? He thought I was dyin' by inches, as well as you. Oh, oh, oh!" and laughed and danced, to the admiration of Blade-o'-Grass, without feeling a particle of gratitude for the benevolent instinct which had saved his companion from starvation.

After this fashion did Blade-o'-Grass learn life's lessons, and learn to fight its battles. Deprived of wholesome teaching and wholesome example; believing, from very necessity, that bad was good; without any knowledge of God and His infinite goodness, she, almost a baby-child, went out into the world, in obedience to the law of nature, in search of food. A slice of bread-and-butter was more to her than all the virtues, the exercise of which, as we are taught, bestows the light of eternal happiness. And yet, if earnest men are to be believed, and if there be truth in newspaper columns, the vast machinery around her was quick with sympathy for her, as one of a class whom it is man's duty to lift from the dust. Such struggles for the amelioration (fine word!) of the human race were being made by earnest natures that it was among the most awful mysteries of the time how Blade-o'-Grass was allowed to grow up in the ignorance which deprives crime of responsibility; how she was forced to be dead to the knowledge of virtue; how she was compelled to earn the condemnation of men, and to make sorrowful the heart of the Supreme!



"AT THE FOOT OF THE LAMP-POST BLADE-O'-GRASS LOOKED UP."

"THERE THEY WERE, THESE BLADES OF GRASS."

MR. MERRYWHISTLE RELIEVES HIMSELF ON THE SUBJECT OF INDISCRIMINATE CHARITY.

THE name of the man who gave Tom Beadle the shilling was Merrywhistle. He was a bachelor, and he lived in the eastern part of the City, in Buttercup Square, next door to his best friends, the Silvers. Although Buttercup Square was in the east of the City, where the greatest poverty is to be found, and where people crowd upon each other unhealthfully, it was as pretty and comfortable a square as could be found any where; and you might live in any house in it and fancy yourself in the country, when you looked out of window. The trees in the square were full of birds' nests, and the singing of the birds of a summer morning was very sweet to the ear.

Mr. Merrywhistle had no trade or profession. When the last census was taken, and the paper was given to him to fill in, he set himself down as "Nothing Particular;" and this eccentric definition of himself coming under the eyes of his landlady—who, like every other landlady, was mighty curious about the age, religion, and occupation of her lodgers, and whether they were single, widowed, or divorced men—was retailed by her to her friends. As a necessary consequence, her friends retailed the information to their friends; and for some little time afterward they used to ask of the landlady and of each other, jocosely, how Nothing Particular was getting along, and whether he had lately done Any thing Particular, and so on. But this mildest of jokes soon died out, and never reached Mr. Merrywhistle's ears. He had an income more than sufficient for his personal wants; but at the year's end not a shilling remained of his year's income. A pale face, a look of distress, a poor woman with a baby in arms, a person looking hungrily in a cook-shop window—any one of these sights was sufficient to melt his benevolent heart, and to draw copper or silver from his pocket. It was said of him that his hands were always in his pockets—a saying which was the occasion of a piece of sarcasm, which grew into a kind of proverb. A lady resident of Buttercup Square, whose husband was of the parsimonious breed, when speaking of Mr. Merrywhistle's benevolence, said, with a sigh, "My husband is just like Mr. Merrywhistle; his hands are always in his pockets." "Yes, ma'am," said an ill-natured friend, "but there the similarity ends. Your husband's hands never come out." Which produced a life-long breach between the parties.

Mr. Merrywhistle was in a very disturbed mood this evening. He was haunted by the face of the old man who had been amused because he had given a poor child a shilling. The thought of this old man proved the most obstinate of tenants to Mr. Merrywhistle; having got into his mind, it refused to be dislodged. He had never seen this man before, and here, in the most unaccountable manner, was he being haunted and distressed by a face which presented itself to his imagination with a mocking expression upon it, because he had been guilty of a charitable act. "I should like to meet him again," said Mr. Merrywhistle to himself; "I'd talk to him!" Which mild determination, hotly expressed, was intended to convey an exceedingly severe meaning. As he could not dislodge the thought of the man from his mind, Mr. Merrywhistle resolved to go to his friends next door, the Silvers, and take tea with them. He went in, and found them, as he expected, just sitting down to tea. Only two of them, husband and wife.

"I am glad you have come in," said Mrs. Silver to him. Her voice might surely have suggested her name, it was so mild and gentle. But every thing about her was the same. Her dress, her quiet manner, her delicate face, her hands, her eyes, where purity dwelt, breathed peace and goodness. She and her sisters (and there are many, thank God!) are the human pearls of the world which is so often called "erring."

"How are the youngsters?" asked Mr. Merrywhistle, stirring his tea.

"All well," answered Mr. Silver; "you'll stay and see them?"

Mr. Merrywhistle nodded, and proceeded with his tea. The meal being nearly over, Mrs. Silver said, "Now, friend, tell us your trouble."

"You see it in my face?" responded Mr. Merrywhistle.

"Yes; I saw it when you entered."

"You have the gift of divination."

"Say, the gift of sympathy for those I love."

Mr. Merrywhistle held out his hand, and she grasped it cordially. Then he told them of the occurrence that took place on the Royal Exchange, and of the singular manner in which he was haunted by the mocking face of the old man who had watched him.

"You have an instinct, perhaps," said Mrs. Silver, "that he was one of the men who might have preached at you, if he had had the opportunity, against indiscriminate charity?"

"No, I don't know, I don't know, I really don't know," replied Mr. Merrywhistle, excitedly. "I think he rather enjoyed it; he seemed to

BLADE-O'-GRASS.

BY B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "GRIF" AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

THE INTERLUDE.

In times gone by it used to be the sometime fashion in the theatres to have an interlude between the acts of the melodrama, so that the mind might find some relief from the thrilling horrors which had just been enacted, and might prepare itself for the more profound horrors to come. Usually there was an interval of time between the acts—in most cases seven years—during which the performers neither changed their linen nor grew any older. This was probably owing to the joyous efforts of those who enacted the interlude, which was invariably composed of songs and dances. Of such material as these shall part of this interlude be composed; striking out the songs, however, and introducing flowers in their stead, as being infinitely more innocent and graceful than the gross and impure lessons taught by the popular songs of the day, which unfortunately flow too readily into such neighborhoods as that of which Stoney Alley forms a limb. Such teaching, in its own sad time, will bear bitter fruit—nay, it is bearing it even now, and the poisoned branches are bending beneath the weight.

Blade-o'-Grass was very young; but the few years she had lived contained many imminent crises—any one of which, but for some timely act of human kindness, might have put an end to her existence. But her life had not been all shade, although it may appear to you and me to have been so: there were lights in it, there were times when she enjoyed. You and I stand in the sun, and contemplate with sadness our fellow-creatures struggling and living in the dark. But it is not dark to them, as it is to us; they were born in it, they live in it, they are used to it. Such sunlight as we enjoy, and are, I hope, thankful for, might make them drunk.

Said Tom Beadle one day to Blade-o'-Grass,

"I say, Bladergrass, why don't yer do somethin', and make a few coppers?"

And Blade-o'-Grass very naturally answered,

"What shall I do, Tom?"

Tom was prepared with his answer.

"Lookee 'ere: why don't you be a flower-gal?"

"Oh, Tom!" exclaimed Blade-o'-Grass, her face flushing, her heart beating, at the prospect of heaven held out to her. "A flower-gal, Tom! A flower-gal! Oh, don't I wish I could be!"

"You'd 'ave to wash yer face, yer know," said Tom, regarding the dirty face of Blade-o'-Grass from a business point of view, "and put a clean frock on."

Down to zero went the hopes of Blade-o'-Grass. A clean face she might have compassed. But a clean frock! That meant a new frock, of course. Blade-o'-Grass had never had a new frock in her life. A new frock! She had never had any thing new—not even a new boot-lace. Despair was in her face. Tom saw it, and said,

"Don't be down in the mug, Bladergrass. We'll see if it can't be done some'ow."

What a hero Tom was in her eyes!

"Oh, Tom," she cried, "if I could be a flower-gal—if I could! I've seen 'em at the Royal Igschange"—she was pretty well acquainted with that locality by this time—"and don't they look prime!" She twined her fingers together nervously. "They've all got clean faces and nice dresses. Oh, 'ow 'appy they must be!"

"And they make lots o' money," said Tom.

"Do they? Oh, don't I wish I was them!"

"And they go to theaytres."

"Do they? Oh, don't I wish I could go to the theaytre!"

"There's Poll Buttons. Why, two year ago, Bladergrass, she was raggeder nor you. And now she comes out—she does come out, I can tell yer! She sells flowers at the Royal Igschange, and she looks as 'appy—as 'appy"—Tom's figures of speech and similes were invariably failures—"as 'appy as can be. Why, I see her the other night at the Standard, and she was in the pit. There was a feller with her a-suckin' a stick. Didn't she look proud! And I 'eerd Bill Britton say as how he saw her at 'Ighbury Barn last Sunday with another feller a-suckin' a stick."

"Do all the swells suck sticks, Tom?" asked Blade-o'-Grass, innocently.

"All the real tip-toppers do," answered Tom.

"Perhaps there's somethin' nice in the knobs," suggested Blade-o'-Grass.

"Perhaps; but I don't think it. You see, it looks swellish, Bladergrass."

"If you 'ad a stick, would you suck it, Tom?"

"I think I should," replied Tom, after a little consideration; "and I'd 'ave one with a large knob. They're all the go." Then Tom came back to the subject of Poll Buttons. "She makes a 'eap o' money. Why, I 'eerd tell as 'ow she sells crocuses and wilets for a tanner a bunch at first. The swells buy a bunch of wilets, and then she coaxes 'em, and ses as 'ow wilets and crocuses ought to go together, and she uses 'er eyes and smiles sweet. Stand up, Bladergrass!"

Blade-o'-Grass stood up, and Tom Beadle scrutinized her.

"Poll Buttons is a reg'lar beauty, they say. But I wish I may die if you won't be a reg'larer beauty when you're as old as Poll is."

"Shall I, Tom? Shall I?" And the eyes of Blade-o'-Grass sparkled, and a bright color came into her cheeks. Even in her ragged frock, and with her dirty face, she looked pretty. "Then I shall get a tanner a bunch for my crocuses and wilets, and when the roses comes in, I'll—I'll—" But her voice trailed off as she looked at her ragged frock, and her lips trembled, and the little glimpse of heaven that lay in the imaginary basket of flowers faded utterly away.

"Don't take on so, Bladergrass," said Tom Beadle; "who knows? I may 'ave a bit o' luck. And if I do, I wish I may die if I don't set you up as a flower-gal! You jist keep up your 'art, and wait a bit."

And one day Tom Beadle really went to Jimmy Virtue's leaving-shop, and asked the price of a new cotton frock, which, after much bargaining, he bought for two shillings and fourpence.

"Who's it for, Tom?" asked Jimmy, testing the coins before he delivered the frock to Tom. "Got a new sweet'art?"

"It's for Bladergrass," replied Tom, complacently. "I'm a-goin' to set her up as a flower-gal. I promised 'er I would when I 'ad a bit o' luck."

"And you've 'ad a bit o' luck?"

"Yes, a reg'lar slice."

"How was it, Tom?"

"Arks no questions, and I'll tell you no lies," responded Tom, saucily, walking away with his precious purchase.

Neither will we be too curious about how the means were acquired which enabled Tom to give Blade-o'-Grass an honest start in life.

That first new common cotton dress! What joy and delight stirred the heart of Blade-o'-Grass as she surveyed it! She devoured it with her eyes, and was as delicate in handling it as if its texture had been of the finest silk. All that she could say was, "Oh, Tom! oh, Tom!" She threw her arms round Tom's neck, and kissed him a hundred times; and Tom felt how sweet it is to give. But Tom's goodness did not end here. He conducted Blade-o'-Grass to a room where she could wash herself and array herself in her new dress. She came out of that room transformed. She had smoothed her hair and washed her face, and the dress became her. She smiled gratefully at Tom when she presented herself to him.

"I'm blessed if Poll Buttons 'll be able to 'old a candle to you!" exclaimed Tom, admiringly; and Blade-o'-Grass thrilled with joy.

Thus it came about that Mr. Merrywhistle, walking near the Royal Exchange one day, saw a clean little girl, with a basket of humble flowers on her arm, and a bright little face looking earnestly at him.

"Bless my soul!" exclaimed the benevolent gentleman. "Blade-o'-Grass!"

"Yes, Sir, if you please. Tom's set me up as a flower-gal."

"Tom!"

"Tom Beadle, Sir; 'im as you guv a shillin' to once, and as come along o' me when we 'ad that jolly dinner."

"Dear me! Dear me!" said Mr. Merrywhistle, honest pleasure beaming in his eyes. "And Tom's set you up, eh? And you're getting an honest living, eh?"

"Yes, Sir, if you please, Sir. Do you want a flower for your button-'ole, Sir? 'Ere's a white rose, Sir—a reg'lar beauty; and 'ere's a piece o' mingyonet to show it off, Sir, and a bit o' maiden-'air to back it up."

And before Mr. Merrywhistle knew where he was, he had put the flowers in his button-hole, and, instructed by Blade-o'-Grass, had fastened them with a pin she took out of her frock. It was thirty years since he had worn a flower, the good old fellow! and as he looked upon them now, there came to him the memory of a few sunny months when he was young. The crowds of people, the busy streets, the noise and turmoil, vanished from sight and sense; and for one brief moment—which might have been an hour, the vision was so distinct—he saw fair fingers fastening a piece of mignonette in his coat, and a fair head bending to his breast— It was gone! But as Mr. Merrywhistle awoke to the busy hum about him, there was a sweet breath in his nostrils, and a dim, sweet light in his eyes. Most unwisely he gave Blade-o'-Grass a shilling for the flowers, and patted her head, and walked away; while Blade-o'-Grass herself, almost fearing that the shilling was a bad one, bit it with her strong teeth, and, being satisfied of its genuineness, executed a double-shuffle on the curb-stone.

That very afternoon Blade-o'-Grass, having had a good day, purchased a walking-cane of a street vendor. It was a cane with the largest knob he had in his stock. This cane she presented to Tom Beadle the same evening. Tom was immensely delighted with it. To the admiration of Blade-o'-Grass, he put the knob in his mouth, to the serious danger of that feature, and comported himself as became a tip-top swell.

"You're a reg'lar little brick," said Tom; "and I'm blessed if I don't take you to the theaytre."

Blade-o'-Grass jumped for joy, and clapped her hands. How she had longed to go to a theatre! And now the magic hour had come. She had been rich enough lately to pay twopence a night for a bed, and she went to the cheap lodging-house she patronized and washed her face and combed her hair, and made herself as smart as she could. Tom Beadle had also smartened himself up, and to the theatre they went, arm in arm, he with the knob of the stick in his mouth, and she, in her rags, as proud as any peacock.

In what words can the awe and wonder of Blade-o'-Grass be described? She had her own ideas of things, and she was surprised to find the interior of the theatre so different from what she had imagined. Boxes, pit, and gallery she knew there were. But she had set down in her mind that the boxes were veritable boxes, in which the people were shut, with little eye-holes to peep through; and the pit she had imagined as a large dark space dug out of the earth, very low down, where the people were all huddled together, and had to look up to see what was going on. It was to the pit they went, and for some time Blade-o'-Grass was too astonished to speak. A very, very large O would fitly describe her condition. Tom Beadle, on the contrary, was quite composed: theatres were but ordinary places to him. But used up as he was to the pleasures of the town, he derived a new pleasure from the contemplation of the wonderment of Blade-o'-Grass.

"Oh, Tom! oh, Tom!" she whispered, in ecstasy, edging closer to him, when at last she found courage to use her tongue. It was a large theatre, with a great deal of gold-leaf about it; and the audience were evidently bent upon enjoying themselves, and vehemently applauded at every possible opportunity. Thus, when the lights are turned up, and a bright blaze breaks out upon the living sea of faces, there is much clapping of hands, and much stamping of feet, and other marks of approval. When the musicians straggle into the orchestra they are also vehemently applauded; but those "high and mighty" might have been by themselves in the Desert of Sahara for all the heed they pay to the audience. The occupiers of the gallery are very noisy in their demonstrations, and issue their commands with stentorian lungs. "Now, then; scrape up, catgut!" "Hoo-o-o-o! scrape up! up with the rag!" with cries and shouts and whistles, which strike fresh wonderment to the soul of Blade-o'-Grass. She is not frightened at the noise; for even Tom Beadle puts his two little fingers to the corners of his lips, and adds shrill whistles to the general confusion—in the performance of which duty he stretches his mouth to such an extent that, as a feature, it becomes a hideous mockery. But at length the band strikes up with a crash, the sound of which is speedily drowned in the roar of delight that follows. In due time—but not in time to satisfy the impatient audience—the music ceases, and a general shifting and rustling takes place among the audience. A moment's breathless expectation follows, a cracked bell gives the meanest of tinkles; and Blade-o'-Grass bends a little more forward as that awful and magic green curtain is drawn upward by invisible hands. The piece that is there and then represented to the wondering soul of Blade-o'-Grass is a "strong domestic drama," as the play-bill has it, and Blade-o'-Grass gasps and sobs and catches her breath at the "striking" situations with which the play is filled. The piece is a narration of the struggles and vicissitudes of the poorest class of the community—the class, indeed, the lower stratum of which is occupied by just such persons as Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass; and a curious commentary is made on it the next day by Blade-o'-Grass, who, dilating upon its wonders and entrancements, declares that she "never seed sich a thing in all her born days." There are, of course, in the piece a painfully virtuous wife, a desperate villain, to whom murder is child's play, a delirium-tremens beggar, a Good Young Man, and a vilified Jew; and as these characters play their parts, Blade-o'-Grass thrills and quivers with delicious excitement. Tom Beadle also enters into the excitement of the representation, and stamps and claps his hands and whistles as vigorously as any one there. But when the "strong domestic drama" is concluded, and the glories of the burlesque are unfolded to the ravished senses of Blade-o'-Grass, then, indeed, is she in heaven. Never has she conceived any thing so enchanting as this. It is the first fairy story that has ever been presented to her. How she screams over the meaningless songs! How she devours with her eyes the display of female limbs! "Oh, 'ow lovely, Tom!" she whispers. "Oh, don't I wish I was them!"

"You'd look as well as any of 'em, Bladergrass," says Tom, who knows every thing, "if you was took in 'and, and if you could darnce."

"Oh no, Tom—oh no!" exclaims Blade-o'-Grass. "I ain't got sich legs."

Tom laughs, and whispers confidentially that "them legs ain't all their own. He knows a cove who knows a balley-gal, and she pads her legs like one o'clock." Blade-o'-Grass, in her heart of hearts, can't believe it; but she is too much absorbed in the performance to enter into argument. So the pageant passes before her eyes until all the songs are sung and all the dances danced; and when the curtain falls upon the brilliant last scene, she looks solemnly at Tom, and a great sob escapes her because it is all over. She can scarcely repress her tears. It is a wondrous night for Blade-o'-Grass, and lives in her memory for long afterward. Tom Beadle proposes "a eel supper," and they sit in state, like the best nobles in the land, in a dirty box in a dirty eel-pie shop; and as they eat their eels off a dirty plate, with a dirty spoon and fork, Blade-o'-Grass looks up to her companion as to a god; and Tom, noticing the girl's sparkling eyes and flushed cheeks, says, with an approving nod, "I'm blessed if you won't beat Poll Buttons into fits." Then they go home, and Blade-o'-Grass dreams that she is an angel hanging from the flies.

That first night at a theatre filled Blade-o'-Grass with a new ambition, and her better prospects inspired her with confidence. She determined to learn to dance.

You will, I am sure, be amazed to hear that every night in Stoney Alley, when the weather was in any way propitious, there was a ball—an open-air ball; the orchestra, an Italian organ-grinder; the company, nearly all the dirty boys and girls in the neighborhood. At a certain hour every evening an Italian organ-grinder, on whose dark face a fixed expression of stolid, gloomy melancholy forever rested, made his appearance in Stoney Alley; and, as if he were a lost soul, and this agony was his penance, ground out of his afflicted organ a string of waltzes and polkas and quadrilles so inexpressibly dismal that the very dogs howled in despair and fled. But directly the first note sounded—and that first note always came out with a wail—the children, from two years old and upward, began to congregate, and without any courtesying, or bowing, or engaging of partners, the strangest ball commenced that ever was seen. Girls with babies in their arms glided round and round in the entrancing waltz; children who could scarcely toddle toddled round; and young ladies without incumbrances clasped each other by the waist, and spun round in a state of beatific bliss. When the waltz music ended with a groan, and the polka commenced with a wheeze, the big children hopped and the toddlers toddled in perfect contentment. Then came the quadrilles, in which many new figures were introduced, which Belgravia might have profited by. But the strangest dance of all was a Scotch reel, which, by some unearthly means, had got into this decrepit organ, and which, being set to work by the inexorable handle, came out of its hiding-place spasmodically, and with stitches in its side. It was a sight to remember to see these ragged children dance this Scotch reel, with their toes up to their knees, their right arms elevated above their heads, and their left hands stuck in their sides as if they grew there. Blade-o'-Grass had never had courage to join in the revels; she had been too ragged and forlorn to claim equality with even this ragged and forlorn troop. But now her prospects were brightening, and her ambition was roused. The very evening following that on which she visited the theatre she boldly joined the dancers. And there she hopped and twirled and glided until the music ceased; and every evening thereafter she made her appearance at the entertainment as punctually as some people attend their places of worship, and with more devotion than many. She was looked upon as a guest of high distinction at the ball, for she was liberal with her farthings and half-pence. In course of time she became one of the very best dancers in the alley, and often and often dreamed that she was a ballet-girl, and was twirling before an admiring audience, in the shortest of short spangled skirts, and the pinkest of pink legs.

These were the happiest days she had ever known. Now and then the tiger set up its claims, and was not satisfied; but these occasions were very rare. She went to the theatre often, and sometimes treated Tom Beadle, who did not show a stupid pride and independence. She sold flowers in the season, and lived how she could when there were no flowers to sell. "I wish they growed all the year round," she said to Tom many and many a time. She and Tom were always together, and it was understood that they had "taken up with one another."

This being an interlude, in which the premise set forth has been faithfully carried out—for dances and flowers have been introduced in profusion—it will perhaps be considered out of place to mention that, excepting that she knew how to speak an intelligible language, Blade-o'-Grass was as ignorant of morals and religion as if she had been a four-footed animal. But it is necessary to state this, or you might condemn her unjustly, and look down upon her uncharitably. And while she grew in deeper and deeper ignorance, how the great world labored in which she lived and moved and had her being! One section was in agony because a man of science had by his writings thrown doubt on the grand story of Creation, and had attempted to prove that Adam and Eve were not created; and nine-tenths of the people shrunk in horror from a man who denied the truth of Biblical miracles. Yet one and all believed in a future state—a better one than this, a higher one than this, a holier one than this—to be earned by living a good life, and by doing unto others as we would wish others should do unto us. And Blade-o'-Grass had never raised her eyes and hands to God; she had never said a prayer.

PART II.

THE PRISON WALL.

SEVEN years have passed, and the curtain rises upon a high gloomy stone wall. Grouped about the pavement which skirts the wall are nearly a score of persons waiting in a state of painful expectancy. They are waiting for friends and relatives, and this gloomy stone wall incloses a prison.

Although it is broad day, the aspect of the scene is inexpressibly depressing. It is September, but the treacherous month has crept upon November, and stolen one of its cheerless days, when dull sky and dull atmosphere conspire to send the spirits down to zero. Not that these unhappy mortals require any outward influence to render them miserable; their countenances and attitude show that clearly enough. There are among them young women, almost children, and they stand about the prison with pale faces and clasped hands, with eyes cast down to the earth. They exchange but few words; they have sufficient special occupation in their thoughts to render them indisposed for conversation. They are poorly clad, and some of them shiver as the damp wind steals round the massive wall which shuts out hope.

Near to the prison door are a young and an old woman—one seventeen years of age on her last birthday, the other seventy. The young woman has no covering on her head; the old woman wears an ancient bonnet, which was the fashion once upon a time. Her little wrinkled face is almost hidden in the bonnet, and her ancient cotton dress falls in such straight lines about her that, but for the pale, wrinkled face and the shriveled hands that peep from out the folds of a faded shawl, it might reasonably have been supposed it covers the limbs of a child. The bonnet has moved several times in the direction of the girl-woman, as if its owner were curious about her companion; but the girl takes no notice. At length a piping voice asks, "Are you waiting for some one, my dear?"

The girl answers "Yes," but does not look at the questioner.

"Who for, my dear?"

No answer.

"You needn't mind me," pipes the old woman; "I don't mean any harm; and it does my old heart good to talk. Perhaps you've got a mother of your own."

"Mother!" echoes the girl, somewhat bitterly, and yet with a certain plaintiveness. "No, I've got no mother; I never 'ad one as I knows of."

"Poor dear, poor dear! Come, my dear, talk kindly to an old woman who might be your grandmother. Ay, I might, my dear. I'm seventy-one come the 10th of November, and I'm waiting for my daughter. You've got a long time before you, my dear, before you come to my age."

"Seventy-one!" exclaims the girl. "I shall never be seventy-one. I shouldn't like to be. What's your daughter in for? How old is she? She must be older than me."

"She's thirty, my dear, and she's in for begging. What's yours in for?"

"My what in for?" sharply and sullenly.

"Your friend. You needn't be so sharp with an old woman like me. You may be a mother yourself one day, poor dear!"

The girl turns with a gasp—it may be of joy or pain—and takes the old woman's hand and begs her pardon.

Her friend is in for worse than beggin', the girl says, and relapses into silence, retaining the old woman's hand in hers, however, for a little while.

Many persons pass this way and that, but few bestow a second glance upon the group; and even if pity enters the heart of one and another, it does not take practical shape, and in its passive aspect it is, as is well known, but cold charity. One man, however, lingers in passing, walks a few steps, and hesitates. He has caught a glimpse of a face that he recognizes, and it is evident that he is distressed by it. He turns boldly, and pauses before the forms of the old woman and the girl.

"Blade-o'-Grass!" he exclaims.

She raises her head, and looks him in the face. No shame, no fear, no consciousness of degradation, is in her gaze. She drops him a courtesy, and turns her face toward the prison doors.

Girl as she is, she is a woman, and well-looking. Her dress is of the poorest, and she is not too tidy; but the grace of youth is upon her. It is not upon all who are brought up as she has been. But she has this charm, and good looks as well; and she is grateful for them, for she likes to be called pretty. Remember that, at that momentous period in the life of Blade-o'-Grass when her future hung on a chance, Mrs. Manning "kept the prettiest one, the one with the dimple."

What is it that causes the gravest of expressions to pass into the countenance of Mr. Merrywhistle as Blade-o'-Grass looks up? He does not say; but the grave expression remains upon his face during the interview. He has not seen her since the spring. Somehow or other, he lost sight of her. Years ago, when Tom Beadle "set her up" as a flower-girl, he had a strong inclination to do some substantial good for her—to remove her from the associations by which she was surrounded, and which dragged her down to the lowest level. But, in the first place, he could ill afford it; and, in the second, when he had spoken of his wish to Jimmy Virtue, that worthy had asked him if he thought he could take all the world's work upon his one pair of shoulders. "And after all," Jimmy Virtue had said, "isn't the gal gettin' a honest livin'?"

The old woman peers into Mr. Merrywhistle's face, and as her ancient bonnet goes up in the air, it seems capacious enough to bury her whole body in. Mr. Merrywhistle gives her a kind look, and addresses himself to Blade-o'-Grass.

"This is not a fit place for you—" He is about to add, "my poor child," but her womanly appearance checks him.

"Ain't it?" she replies, with a smile on her lips that is not pleasant to see. "What is, then?"

He is surprised at her reckless manner. "Have you business here? Are you waiting for any one?"

"Yes."

"For whom?"

"Ah, that's what I asked her," pipes the old woman; "but she wouldn't tell me."

"I'm waitin' for Tom," she says, answering him.

"Tom Beadle?"

"Yes, Tom Beadle."

"Is he in prison, then?" he asks, very gently.

"Yes; he's been doin' a month."

"What for?"

"What does it matter? Priggin'—any thin'."

Perceiving that Blade-o'-Grass does not wish to pursue the conversation, Mr. Merrywhistle steps aside, sad at heart; but lingers, looking pityingly at Blade-o'-Grass. As he does so a clock strikes the hour, and the eyes of the expectant group turn eagerly to the prison door, which presently opens. Six or seven persons walk out. The women blink their eyes as they come into the light; the men shake themselves like dogs; some raise their hands to their brows, and look about them as Gulliver might have done when he found himself in a strange land. The little old woman hastens to her daughter, a patient-looking woman, and for a moment two faces are hidden in the ancient bonnet. One man, who has seven or eight friends waiting for him, shakes his fist at the prison, and kicks the stone wall savagely.

"That's how I'd like to serve the guvner of that there cussed hole!" he exclaims. "Give me something to drink, or I shall choke!"

Another man looks around with a vacant stare: there is no one to meet him. With something like a sigh his head sinks into his shoulders, and he slinks away, hugging the wall as he goes.

The last to come out is Tom Beadle. Blade-o'-Grass is by his side in an instant.

"Come along, Tom," she says, clinging fondly to his arm, and pulling his face down to hers and kissing it; "I've got something nice to eat at home."

"You're a good sort, Bladergrass," says the thief. "Let's get away from this place quick, and go home."

Home! Yes, to Stoney Alley, not twenty yards from where her mother had died—a room in an attic, which had been thoroughly cleaned and made tidy for the return of the prodigal. No furniture to speak of; a fire, and a saucepan on the hob; a mug of beer, a flat bottle with gin in it; one chair and a stool and a table; a bed in the corner.

Tom surveys the room with satisfaction beaming in his eyes. Blade-o'-Grass looks at him, and joy breaks like sunlight over her face because he is pleased.

"Drink some beer, Tom."

He takes a deep draught, puts the jug down, heaves a long breath, and repeats,

"You're a real good sort, Bladergrass. Give us another kiss, old gal!"

ONE OF MANY HAPPY NIGHTS.

BUT that the gray streaks are thickening in Mrs. Silver's hair, and that her husband is fast growing bald, it might have been but yesterday that we were sitting with them in the cozy parlor in Buttercup Square. Every thing inanimate is the same as it was seven years ago, and does not appear to have grown any older or shabbier; the very cuckoo in the clock retains its youth, and its tones, as it asserts itself to be the great "I am," are as fresh as ever they were. Hark! it is speaking now, and "Cuck-oo!" issues six times from its throat, sparklingly, as if defying time. It is six o'clock. The days are drawing in, and it is dark enough for lights. But Mr. and Mrs. Silver sit in the dusk before the fire, talking of the matters nearest to their hearts. Their married life has been a happy one—with clouds in it, of course. Natural griefs and sorrows have come to them, as to others. At first a storm threatened their future, but it did not burst over them. The exercise of kindly impulse; the wise and good desire to accept the inevitable, and to make the loneliness of their lives a means of happiness to others; their dependence on one another, and mutual love and faith: their recognition, in their every action, of higher duties of life than are generally acknowledged in practice—turned the storm to sunshine, brought happiness to them. If they were to die now, they would be blessed with the happy assurance that their lives had been productive of good to others. So might we all live; so should we all live. The world would be the better for it. No man or woman is unblessed with the want of continual opportunity for doing good or being kind.

"Christmas will very soon be here once more," says Mr. Silver.

"We'll have a merry gathering," Mrs. Silver answers. "There will be changes before the next comes round."

"Yes; our little children are men and women now."

"Good men and women, thank God!"

"Wife," he says, "I have thought many times of your words when I brought little Charley home twenty-three years ago. The child was lying in your lap, and you said, 'Perhaps this is the reason why God has given us no children.'"

She looks at him with a tender light in her eyes. Between these two love does not show itself in words, but in ministering to each other unselfishly.

"They have been a blessing to us, dear," she says. "Our household will be smaller presently. Charley and Ruth, I think, are fond of each other. He brings her home now every night."

"What did Charley earn last week?"

"Thirty-eight shillings."

"Is that sufficient to marry on?"

"Quite sufficient, and to spare; and Charley has money put by to start with. They must live near us. Charley would like to, I know, and Ruth too; but it will be time enough to talk of these things by-and-by."

"Carry your mind ten years on, my dear."

"Well, I do so."

"What do you see?"

"If we live?"

"If we live."

She muses a little, looking into the fire.

"Ourselves old people; Charley and Ruth happily married, with children of their own; Mary married also, although her prince is not yet come, and is a stranger to us. Richard will go abroad: I can tell, by his reading and conversation, that his heart is set upon it. And Rachel—poor Rachel!—stopping sometimes with us, and sometimes—nearly always, indeed—with Ruth and Charley. I can see myself with hair perfectly white, and you with only a fringe of white hair round your head."

He laughs softly and pleasantly, and caresses her hand.

"I can see nothing but happiness, dear."

They sit quietly before the fire, and the darkness grows deeper. The door opens, and Mr. Merrywhistle enters softly.

"Don't stir," he says; "and don't light the gas. I was told you were here, and I know how fond you are of sitting in the dark."

It was indeed a favorite habit with them when they were alone. He sits by them in silence; for a minute or two no word is spoken. Then Mrs. Silver places her hand lightly on his shoulder.

"I understand, I understand," he says; "you are waiting for me to speak. You always know when I am in trouble."

"How can I help knowing? Your face I can not see, but I hear your heart in your voice."

"Tell me: is it a good thing to make other persons' troubles ours?"

"What is sympathy for?" she answers, in return.

"I have spoken to you now and again of a child—a girl—whom I have seen occasionally—"

"The flower-girl?"

"Yes, the flower-girl; the girl whom I met for the first time in the company of a boy who deceived me—a boy who told me the most unblushing lies—stories, and who yet had some humanity in him."

"That is many years ago. The girl must be almost a woman now."

"She is a woman, God help her!—more woman than her years warrant. I should think she is about the same age as Ruth. And it comes upon me again, that fancy, when I speak of Ruth and think of this poor girl."

"Yes; you have told us there is a singular likeness between them."

"It is striking—wonderfully striking. But there can be nothing in it; for Ruth, you have said, was the only child of a poor woman who died a fortnight after the little thing was born."

"Yes, my friend."

"So that it is pure accident; but the fancy remains, for all that. I shall never forget the sad story that this poor Blade-o'-Grass told me of the tiger that worried her, and clamored for food. It was hunger, my dear friends, hunger. I shall never forget her notion that Hallelujah came to her while she was asleep, and put baked potatoes in her lap. I shall never forget my pleasure when I first saw her with a basket of flowers, and bought a flower of her. But I have told you of these things before, and here I am babbling of them again, like an old man that has lost his wits."

'Never mind, friend; go on."

"I saw poor Blade-o'-Grass this morning. I haven't seen her for many months. I had occasion to pass by a certain prison early, and I saw her, with a dozen others, waiting outside. She was waiting for this boy that was—this man and thief that is. I lingered until the prison doors were opened, and let him and others out. And when he came"—there were tears in the old man's voice as he spoke—"and when he came, this unhappy girl kissed him and clung to him as with less shame she might have kissed and clung to a better man, had she been taught something good when she was younger."

"My dear, dear friend!" says Mrs. Silver, taking his hand in hers.

"I can not tell you what I feared as I saw her, and spoke to her before the prison doors were opened. Poor Blade-o'-Grass! poor child! Nay, let me have my way."

And this good old man, whose heart is as tender as that of a good woman, sheds tears and trembles; if a daughter's happiness had been at stake, he could not have been more moved. Wisely, Mr. and Mrs. Silver do not disturb him, but talk together of other subjects until Mr. Merrywhistle exclaims, with something of his usual cheerfulness, "What on earth are we sitting in the dark for?" Whereat Mr. Silver smiles, and lights the gas. As if the light is the means of suddenly waking up the cuckoo from a nap, it immediately proclaims seven o'clock, and in another hour the whole of Mrs. Silver's family are assembled in the parlor. Rachel, the blind girl, has no out-door occupation, but all the others have. Charley, as you know, is a printer, and, being out of his time, is earning good wages; Richard is a watch-maker, still an apprentice, and making famous progress; and Mary and Ruth are both of them in the postal telegraph office. For it has been part of Mrs. Silver's plan to give her family the opportunity of making their way in the world, and boys and girls have been taught that to work is one of the chief duties and one of the best blessings of life. Charley and Ruth come in together. He has grown quite a man since we last saw him, and Ruth, Blade-o'-Grass's sister, is as bright and cheerful-looking a lass as one can meet. She is particularly bright just now, and looks particularly happy, for she and Charley have had a brisk walk; her cheeks are glowing healthfully, and there is a bright sparkle in her eyes. Then questions are asked and answered. The events of the day are narrated, and it is wonderful what interest is manifested in these trifles. Every few minutes the comfortable parlor in Buttercup Square is filled with merry laughter.

"Come, come, children," says Mr. Silver, after nearly an hour has been spent in this manner; "are we to have any reading to-night?"

The books are instantly brought forward, and the youngsters are busy turning over the leaves. When last we were in their company they were deep in the beautiful story of "Paul and Virginia." Since then they have had rare nights with their favorite authors, and have laughed and cried, as hundreds of thousands of others have done, over the sayings and doings of the men and women and children who play their parts in the pages of Thackeray and Scott and Dickens and Jerrold, and authors of long ago. It is not a novel that engages their attention now; this is one of their "play" nights, when scenes from Shakspeare are read. When the rustling of the leaves has ceased, they all with one accord turn to Rachel, the blind girl. She knows they are looking at her, and her face flushes as she says, "Yes, I am ready." Then says Richard, in a deep bass voice, laying his finger on the first line of the fourth act of "The Merchant of Venice," "What, is Antonio here?" And Charley forthwith answers, "Ready, so please your grace;" and the play commences. They all take parts, with the exception of Mr. Merrywhistle, who is the audience, and who applauds as if the house is packed, and there is not standing room for one. Mr. Silver takes Shylock (the villain's part generally falls to his share), and Ruth reads the few lines that Nerissa has to say. But the great wonder of the reading takes place when Richard, as the Duke, says,

"You hear the learned Bellario, what he writes:
And here, I take it, is the doctor come."

Up rises Rachel, the blind girl.

"Give me your hand. Come you from old Bellario?"

And Rachel bows, and answers, in a gentle voice, "I did, my lord." The scene proceeds, and Rachel speaks Portia's lines with grace and power, and does not falter at a word. How they all praise her and cluster round her when the act is finished, and the books are closed!

But this is only one of very many such nights passed in that happy home in Buttercup Square.

FACE TO FACE—SO LIKE, YET SO UNLIKE.

On the following Saturday Ruth and Charley had a holiday, which, with the sanction of their kind guardians, they intended to spend at the International Exhibition. The holiday had been planned a month before its arrival, and had, indeed, been the occasion of an innocent conspiracy between Ruth and Rachel and Charley, and of much mysterious conversation. Rachel was to accompany them. The day, which had been looked forward to with such rapturous anticipation as only the young can experience and enjoy, at length arrived. In a very flutter of delight, the two girls and their hero—for Charley was Rachel's hero as well as Ruth's—bade Mrs. Silver good-morning, and went out into the streets with joy in their hearts. Very tender were they to each other, and very tender were Ruth and Charley to their blind companion. No words of love had passed between Ruth and Charley, although their attachment was known to their kind guardians, as you have read. But, indeed, no words were required; their looks, their almost unconsciously exercised tenderness toward one another, were sufficient confirmation of mutual affection. These two young persons were enjoying the purest, happiest dream that life contains. May all the grown-up people who read these pages have enjoyed such a pure and happy dream! May all others live to enjoy it!

Ruth and Charley, of course, with the usual blindness of lovers, believed that no one noticed any thing particular in their behavior; but in this respect they were as blind as Rachel—more so, indeed, if there be degrees in blindness, for even she guessed their secret. In the course of their rambles through the Exhibition, she sat down and asked to be left alone for a while, and when Ruth and Charley demurred, insisted, with a pretty and affectionate willfulness, on having her own way.

"And don't hurry," she said, turning her face to them and smiling sweetly. "You will find me here when you come back. I am tired, and want a long, long rest."

And there the blind girl sat, seeing nothing, enjoying every thing, while unsuspecting Ruth and Charley wandered away into fairy-land, arm in arm. Soft strains of music came to Rachel's ears, and she listened and drank them in, with clasped hands and head inclined. She was as one inspired; visions of beauty passed before her, and the melodious notes were imbued with palpable loveliness for her. Many a passer-by paused to look at her beautiful face, and felt the better for it, and a great lady came and sat down beside her. When the music ceased, the lady said, "My dear, are you here alone?"

"Oh no," replied Rachel, "I have friends; I asked them to let me sit by myself. I wanted to listen to the music. They will come for me presently."

"You love music?"

"Who can help loving it? I can see it."

The lady's voice was soft and sweet, and Rachel felt goodness in her manner. "Tell me," she said, "what is before me."

They were sitting opposite a piece of sculpture—a perfect work—and the lady described it, and described it well, and told the story that it illustrated.

"Ah," sighed the blind girl, "it is beautiful!"

The lady was accompanied by her husband and child.

"Is this your little daughter?" asked Rachel.

"My dear," exclaimed the lady, "I thought—thought—"

"That I was quite blind," said Rachel, smiling. "So I am. But see—your little girl's hand is in mine."

And indeed the child, who was standing by her mother's side, had placed her hand in Rachel's, beneath the folds of the blind girl's shawl.

"And without that I think I could tell," added Rachel.

"Yes, my dear, it is my little girl," said the lady.

Rachel stooped and kissed the child, whose hand stole round Rachel's neck, and caressed it. Lips purer and more innocent had never met. So they sat, talking for a little while longer, until Rachel raised her face, and smiled a happy greeting to Ruth and Charley, who were standing before her. The lady and the child bade good-by to Rachel, and kissed her; and when they met again, an hour afterward, the child gave Rachel a flower.

Like the incense of a breeze that has been wandering among sweet-smelling plants, like the soft plash of water on a drowsy day, like the singing of birds, are such small circumstances as these. Thank God for them!

And what had Ruth and Charley been doing? Dreaming—nothing more—walking almost in silence among the busy, eager, bustling crowd, standing before works of beauty, and enjoying. Every thing was beautiful in their eyes. Perfect harmony encompassed them; the commonest things were idealized; their souls were filled with a sense of worship.

How quickly the hours passed! It seemed to them that they had been in the place but a few minutes, and it was already time for them to go. They left with many a sigh, and many a parting glance at the wonders which lined the spaces through which they walked. Ruth's hand was clasped in Charley's beneath her mantle, and a tender light was in her eyes as they made their way through the restless throng. It was still light when the omnibus put them down within a mile of Buttercup Square. The tram-way carriage would have carried them to the avenue that led to Buttercup Square; but both Ruth and Rachel expressed a desire to walk, wishful perhaps to prolong the happy time. Charley, nothing loath, gave an arm to each of the girls, and they walked slowly onward, Rachel being nearest to the wall. They were passing a man and a girl, who were talking together. The girl had just uttered some words to the man, who was leaving her, when Rachel cried suddenly, in a voice of alarm,

"Ruth, was it you who spoke?"

Her face was deadly pale, and her limbs were trembling.

"No, Rachel," answered Ruth, surprised at the blind girl's agitation.

As she replied, both she and Charley turned, and saw Blade-o'-Grass. Thus, for the first time since their infancy, the sisters looked each other in the face. Each saw, instantaneously, such a resemblance to herself, that they leaned toward each other in sudden bewilderment. Their gaze lasted scarcely as long as one might count three, for Charley hurried Ruth and Rachel on; he also had seen with amazement the likeness that Blade-o'-Grass bore to Ruth, and that there should be any resemblance to his treasure in such a forlorn, disreputable-looking creature as Blade-o'-Grass, smote him with a sense of pain. Ruth walked along, dazed; but before they had gone a dozen yards she stopped, and pressed her hand to her heart.

"Ruth! dear Ruth!" exclaimed Charley, placing his arm round her, for indeed she was almost falling. She released herself, and said, in a faint voice,

"Rachel, why did you ask if it was I who spoke?"

"The tone was so exactly like yours, Ruth," answered Rachel, "that the words slipped out from me unaware. Who was it that spoke?"

"It must have been a poor girl whom we have just passed."

"What is she like?"

Ruth's lips trembled, but she did not answer the question.

"Why must the words have slipped from you unaware, Rachel?"

"Because, if I had considered an instant, I should not have asked. You could not have said such a thing."

"What thing?—Nay, Charley, don't interrupt me," said Ruth, in such an imploring tone that he was mute from fear, for Ruth's eyes were filled with tears, and her face was very pale. "What thing, Rachel?"

"Just then," answered Rachel, slowly and solemnly, "a voice said, 'For God's sake, Tom, bring home some money, for there's not a bit of bread in the cupboard!'"

"Charley!" cried Ruth, hurriedly, "stand here with Rachel for a few moments. Don't follow me; let me go alone."

She was his queen, and he obeyed her; but his apprehensive looks followed her, although he did not stir from the spot. Ruth hastened to where Blade-o'-Grass was standing. The poor outcast was very wan and wretched. Ruth knew part of her own history; for Mrs. Silver, when her adopted children arrived at a proper age, had told them, gently, as much of the story of their lives as she deemed it right and necessary for them to know. The hours in which she unfolded their stories to her children were quiet and solemn; there was no one present but she and her adopted one; and she told them their history so gently, and with such sweet words of love, that they were never unhappy when they learned the truth. Ruth, therefore, knew that she was an orphan; and she, in common with the others, had shed many grateful tears, and had offered up many grateful prayers, for the merciful heart that had made life a blessing to her. As she stood before her sister, so like, yet so unlike—her sister never to be recognized, or acknowledged as of her blood—the thought came to her, "But for my dear good mother I might have been like this—ragged, forlorn, hungry, with not a bit of bread in the cupboard!"

Blade-o'-Grass, whose wistful eyes had followed the strange likeness to herself, saw Ruth turn back, and dropped a courtesy as her sister, in her warm, soft dress, stood before her.

Then said Ruth, timidly, "It was you who said that?" She herself might have been the suppliant, her voice and manner were so quiet and humble.

"Said what, miss?"

"That you hadn't a bit of bread in the cupboard."

"It's true, miss, and to-morrow's Sunday."

Ruth thought of what a happy day the Sabbath was to her and hers in Buttercup Square, the goodness of it, the peacefulness of it! And this forlorn girl before her, the sight of whom had so strangely unnerved her, had only one thought of that happy Sabbath to-morrow—whether she would be able to get bread to eat. Tears choked her voice as she asked, "Will you tell me your name?"

"Blade-o'-Grass, miss."

Ruth looked up in surprise. "Is that your real name?"

"Yes, miss; I ain't got no other."

Ruth's hand had been in her pocket from the first, with her purse in it; but she could scarcely muster sufficient courage to give. She judged poor Blade-o'-Grass with the eyes of her own sensitive soul, and felt that if money were offered to her she would sink to the earth in shame.

"Will you pardon me," she said, hesitatingly, the hot blood flushing her neck and face; "will you pardon me if I offer you—if I beg of you to—to—"

The hand of Blade-o'-Grass was held out eagerly, imploringly, and Ruth emptied her purse into it. Blade-o'-Grass wondered at the munificence of the gift, and the modesty with which it was given, and her fingers closed greedily on the silver coins.

"God Almighty bless you, miss!" she exclaimed, taking Ruth's hand and kissing it. "God Almighty bless you!" The tears were streaming down both their faces. A warm hand-pressure, a last grateful look from Blade-o'-Grass, and the sisters parted.

"Oh, Charley! Charley!" sobbed Ruth, as she clasped his arm, "I might have been like that!" They walked in silence to their home, and Ruth whispered to her companions not to say any thing to their kind guardians of what had taken place. "It might make them sad," she said.

It was dusk when they went in-doors. Rachel went to her room first, and Ruth and Charley lingered in the passage.

"Ruth!" he whispered.

She laid her head upon his breast with the confidence and innocence of a child. He stooped and kissed her cheek, still wet with her tears. She clung to him more closely—hid her face in his neck. A wondering happiness took possession of them.

ROBERT TRUEFIT ALLOWS HIS FEELINGS TO MASTER HIM.

THE chance acquaintanceship which had so strangely sprung up seven years ago between Mr. Merrywhistle, Robert Truefit, and Jimmy Virtue had ripened into intimacy, and it was not unusual for the three to meet in the old man's leaving-shop in Stoney Alley. The shop and the stock were, on the whole, less fragrant than on the occasion of Mr. Merrywhistle's first introduction to them. An additional seven years' mouldiness lay heavy on the shelves; but familiarity had rendered the musty vapor less objectionable to the benevolent gentleman. There was no perceptible change of importance in Jimmy Virtue; his skin certainly had got tougher and dryer and yellower, but otherwise he did not seem to be a day older. His eyebrows were as precipitous, and his glass eye as mild, and his fierce eye as fierce, as ever they were. No perceptible change, either, was to be observed in the articles which filled his shop: the same faded dresses and dirty petticoats were crammed into inconvenient corners; the same crinolines loomed from unlikely places; the same old boots hung from the ceiling; and doubtless the same vanities of vanities were inclosed in the box which served as a resting-place in Jimmy Virtue's parlor.

It was a dull, miserable November night. A thick fog had lain upon Stoney Alley during the day, necessitating the use of candles and gas; toward the evening the fog had cleared away, and a dismal rain had set in; Stoney Alley and its neighboring courts and lanes were overlaid with dirty puddles. It was by a strange chance, therefore, that Mr. Merrywhistle and Robert Truefit found themselves in Jimmy Virtue's parlor on this evening; they said as much to each other. Each of them had some special business which brought him in Jimmy's neighborhood, and he expressed his pleasure when he saw them. They were the only living friends he had; other friends he had, but they were not human; notwithstanding which, some hours would have hung dreadfully upon Jimmy's hands if he had been deprived of them. These friends were aces, deuces, knaves, and the like; in other words, a pack of cards. Very dirty, very greasy, very much thumbed and dog's-eared, but very useful. Jimmy spent comfortable hours with these friends. Sitting in his chair, he would place an imaginary opponent on the seat opposite to him, and would play blind All-Fours with his unreal foe for large sums of money. "Jack" was the name of his opponent; and Jimmy often talked to him, and called him a fool for playing, and abused him generally for incapacity. For Jimmy nearly always won; and many and many a night Jack was dismissed a ruined and broken-hearted shadow, while Jimmy, after putting up his shutters, let down his turn-up bedstead, and went to bed a winner of hundreds, sometimes of thousands of pounds. For Jack's wealth was enormous; he never refused a bet, never declined "double or quits." So reckless a player was he—being egged on by Jimmy—that it was impossible he could have come by his money honestly. Be that as it may, his ill-gotten gains were swept into Jimmy's imaginary coffers, to the old man's delight and satisfaction. It is a positive fact, that Jimmy had grown into a sort of belief in Jack's existence, and often imagined that he saw a shadowy opponent sitting opposite him. There was a very good reason why Jimmy so invariably won and Jack so invariably lost. Jimmy cheated. He often slipped into his own cards an ace or a knave that properly belonged to Jack. When Jimmy did this, his manner was as wary and cautious as though flesh and blood opposed him. It was a picture to see this old man playing All-Fours with Jack for ten pounds a game, or for "double or quits," and cheating his helpless adversary.

When Mr. Merrywhistle and Robert Truefit entered Jimmy's parlor—they had met at the door of the leaving-shop—he was playing greasy All-Fours with Jack, and had just scored a winning game. Robert Truefit always had something new to speak of: a trade-union outrage, a strike, a flagrant instance of justices' justice, a mass-meeting and what was said thereat, and other subjects, of which a new crop springs up every day in a great country where tens of millions of people live and have to be legislated for. The late war, of course, was a fruitful theme with Robert Truefit, who spoke of it as an infamous outrage upon civilization. Especially indignant was he at the sacrilege which lay in one king invoking "the God of Battles," and in the other praying to the Supreme to assist him in bringing desolation and misery to thousands of homes. But this is no place for the outpourings of Robert's indignation on those themes. From those lofty heights they came down, after a time, to Blade-o'-Grass. It was Mr. Merrywhistle who introduced her name. He asked Jimmy if he had seen her lately. No; Jimmy hadn't seen her for a month.

"You see," said Jimmy, "she's a woman now, and 'as been on 'er own 'ook this many a year. Besides which, once when I spoke to her she was sarcy, and checked me because I wanted to give 'er a bit of advice—good advice, too. But she was up in the stirrups then."

"Has she ever been prosperous?" inquired Mr. Merrywhistle.

"Well, not what you would call prosperous, I dare say; but she's 'ad a shillin' to spare now and agin. And then, agin, she 'asn't, now and agin. She's 'ad her ups and downs like all the other gals about 'ere; you couldn't expect any thin' else, you know. And of course you've 'eerd that Tom Beadle and 'er—"

"Tom Beadle and her—what?" asked Mr. Merrywhistle, as Jimmy paused.

"Oh, nothin'," replied Jimmy, evasively; "it's sich a common thing that it ain't worth mentionin'."

"I saw her myself about six weeks ago," said Mr. Merrywhistle; and he narrated how he had met Blade-o'-Grass outside the prison, and what had passed between them, and what he had seen. "Tell me," he said, "is she married to Tom Beadle?"

Jimmy Virtue's eye of flesh expressed that Mr. Merrywhistle outrivaled Simple Simon in simplicity. "I do believe," thought Jimmy, "that he gits greener and greener every time I see him." Then he said aloud, contemptuously, "Married to Tom! As much as I am!"

Mr. Merrywhistle twisted his fingers nervously, and otherwise so comported himself as to show that he was grieved and pained.

"I wouldn't 'ave a 'art as soft as yours," thought Jimmy, as Mr. Merrywhistle rested his head upon his hand sadly, "and as green as yours—no, not for a 'atful of money."

"Poor child! poor child!" exclaimed Mr. Merrywhistle. "I wish I could do something for her."

"Too late," said Jimmy, shortly.

"Yes, too late, I'm afraid," said Robert Truefit. "Blade-o'-Grass is a woman now. Her ideas, her principles, her associations are rooted. When she was a sapling, good might have been done for her, and she might have grown up straight. But she had no chance, poor thing! And Jimmy's tone and your fears point to something worse than hunger. You fear she is leading a bad life."

"No, no!" interposed Mr. Merrywhistle, earnestly; "not that—indeed, not that. But I would give more than I could afford if I knew that she was married to Tom Beadle."

"Thief as he is?" questioned Robert Truefit.

"Thief as he is," replied Mr. Merrywhistle.

His grief was contagious: Robert Truefit turned away, with a troubled look on his face; Jimmy Virtue preserved a stolid silence, as was his general habit on such occasions. "What can one good man do?" presently said Robert Truefit, in a low tone; but his voice was singularly clear. "What can a hundred good men do, each working singly, according to the impulse of his benevolent heart? I honor them for their deeds, and God forbid that I should harbor a wish to check them! Would that more money were as well spent, and that their numbers were increased a hundredfold! They do some good. But is it not cruel to know that Blade-o'-Grass is but one of thousands of human blades who are cursed, shunned, ignored, through no fault of theirs, and who, when circumstances push them into the light, are crushed by System? If they were lepers, their condition would be better. And they might be so different! To themselves, and all around them. To the state; to society. Is it not enough almost to make one believe that our statesmen are blind or grievously misled, or that they are playing at politics, or that they have set themselves in such high places that they can't stoop to give a hand where help is most needed, where good advice and good example are most needed? What do they do for such poor places as these? Give them gin-shops and an extra number of police. No effort made for improvement; no clearing away of nest-holes where moral corruption and physical misery fester and ripen. And while they legislate, Blades-o'-Grass are springing up all around them, and living poisoned lives. And while they legislate, if there be truth in what preachers preach, souls are being damned by force of circumstance. What should be the aim of those who govern? So to govern as to produce the maximum of human happiness and comfort, and the minimum of human misery and vice. Not to the few—to the many, to all." He paused, and turned to Mr. Merrywhistle. "Seven years ago," he continued, "we talked of poor Blade-o'-Grass. I told you then—I remember it well—that England was full of such pictures as that hungry, ignorant child, with the tiger in her stomach, presented. Seven years before that it was the same. During that time Blade-o'-Grass has grown up from a baby to a woman. What a childhood must hers have been! I wonder if she ever had a toy! And see what she is now: a woman for whom you fear—what I guess, but will not say. What will she be—where will she be—in seven years from now? Seventy years is the fullness of our age. Carry Blade-o'-Grass onward for seven years more, and find her an old woman long before she should have reached her prime. What has been done in the last seven years for such as she? What will be done in the next—and the next? There are thousands upon thousands of such babes and girls as she was seven years and twice seven years ago growing up as I speak; contamination is eating into their bones, corrupting their blood, poisoning their instincts for good. What shall be done for them in the next seven years? Pardon me," he said, breaking off suddenly; "I have let my feelings run ahead of me, perhaps; but I'll stick to what I've said, nevertheless."

With that he wished them good-night, and took his leave. Mr. Merrywhistle soon followed him, first ascertaining from Jimmy Virtue the address of Blade-o'-Grass.

Jimmy, being left to his own resources, went to the door to see what sort of a night it was. The rain was still falling drearily. It was too miserable a night for him to take his usual pipe in the open air, and too miserable a night for him to expect to do any business in. So he put up his shutters, and retired to his parlor. Then he took out his greasy pack of cards, and conjured up Jack for a game of All-Fours. With his eye on his opponent, he filled his pipe carefully, lighted it, puffed at it, and cut for deal. He won it, and the first thing he did after that was to turn up a knave (slipping it from the bottom of the pack) and score one. He was in a more than usually reckless and cheating mood. He staked large sums, went double or quits, and double or quits again, and cheated unblushingly. He won a fortune off Jack in an hour; and then contemptuously growled, "I'll try you at cribbage, old fellow." The cribbage-board was his table, and he scored the game with a bit of chalk. Jack fared no better at cribbage than he had done at All-Fours. Jimmy had all the good cribs, Jack all the bad ones. By the time that the table was smeared all over with chalk figures, Jimmy was sleepy. He played one last game for an enormous stake, and having won it and ruined Jack, he went to bed contentedly, and slept the sleep of the just.

TOO LATE.

MR. MERRYWHISTLE had no very distinct plan in his mind when he left Jimmy Virtue's shop to visit Blade-o'-Grass. Sincerely commiserating her condition, he wished to put her in the way to get an honest and respectable living, but was deeply perplexed as to the method by which she was to arrive at this desirable consummation. Some small assistance in money he might manage to give her; but in what way could it be applied? By what means was she to be lifted out of that slough into which she had been allowed to sink? And then he feared that she was past training. As Robert Truefit had said, Blade-o'-Grass was a woman now, with a grown-up person's passions and desires firmly rooted in her nature. And he feared something else, also. But he would see her and speak to her freely; good might come of it.

The room she occupied was at the extreme end of Stoney Alley, and Mr. Merrywhistle was soon stumbling along dark passages and up flights of crippled stairs. When he reached the top of the house, as he thought, he tapped at a door, and, receiving no answer, turned the handle and entered. A very old woman, sitting before a very small fire, smiled and mumbled in reply to his questions; and he soon discovered that she was deaf and childish, and that he was in the wrong apartment. As he stumbled into the dark again, a woman, with a child in her arms, came on to the landing with a candle in her hand, and showed Mr. Merrywhistle that there was still another flight of stairs to mount. Blade-o'-Grass lived up there, the woman said; first door on the right. She didn't know if the girl was at home. And then she asked if he was a doctor. No, he answered, surprised at the question; he was not a doctor. The crazy stairs complained audibly as he trod them. He knocked at the first door on the right, and paused.

"You'd better go in, and see, Sir," called the woman from below; "perhaps she's asleep." Mr. Merrywhistle hesitated. What right, he thought, had he to intrude on the girl's privacy, and at this time of night? But the knowledge that he was there for no bad purpose made him bold, and he opened the door. A candle that was burning on the table threw a dim light around, but the corners of the miserable apartment were in shade. The woman was right in her conjecture; Blade-o'-Grass was in the room, asleep. She was lying on the ground, dressed, before a mockery of a fire; her head was resting on a stool, round which one arm was thrown. The faintly flickering flames threw occasional gleams of light on the girl's face, over which, strange to say, a smile was playing, as if her dreams were pleasant ones. The benevolent old gentleman looked round upon the miserable apartment, and sighed. It was a shelter, nothing more—a shelter for want and destitution. Then he looked down upon the form of the sleeping girl, clothed in rags. Child-woman, indeed, she was. Her pretty face was thin and pale; but there was a happy expression upon it, and once her arm clasped the stool with fond emotion, as if she were pressing to her breast something that she loved. Yet, doubtless, there are many stern moralists, philanthropic theorists, and benevolent word-wasters, who would have looked coldly upon this sleeping child, and who—self-elected teachers as they are of what is good and moral—would only have seen in her and her surroundings a text for effervescent platitudes. But the school in which they learn their lessons is as cruel and harsh as the school in which Blade-o'-Grass learns hers is unwholesome and bitter.

Mr. Merrywhistle was debating with himself whether he should arouse her, when a slight motion on his part saved him the trouble of deciding. "Is that you, Tom?" she asked, softly, opening her eyes, and then, seeing a strange figure before her, scrambled to her feet.

"I have come to see you," said Mr. Merrywhistle.

Although she courtesied, she was scarcely awake yet. But presently she said, "Oh yes, Sir; I arks yer pardon. It's Mr. Merrywhistle?"

"Yes, child; may I sit down?"

She motioned him to the only chair the room contained. "It's very late, ain't it?" she asked. And then, anxiously, "Is any think up?"

Mr. Merrywhistle was sufficiently versed in vulgar vernacular to understand her meaning. No, he said, there was nothing the matter.

She gave a sigh of relief as she said, "I thought you might 'ave come to tell me somethin' bad."

"How long have you lived here?"

"Oh, ever so long."

"Alone?" he asked, after a slight pause.

But to this question she made no reply.

"Times are hard with you, are they not, my child?" he said, approaching his subject.

"Very 'ard," she answered, with a weary shake of the head.

"Have you given up selling flowers?"

"'Tain't the season for flowers," she answered; "wilets won't be in for three months."

He felt the difficulty of the task he had set himself. "How do you live when there are no flowers?"

"Any 'ow; sometimes I sells matches; I can't tell you 'ow, and that's a fact."

"But why don't you work?" he inquired, with a bold plunge.

"Work!" she exclaimed. "What work? I don't know nothin'. But I've been arksed that lots of times. A peeler told me that once, and when I arksed him to get me some work that I could do, he only larfed."

"Suppose now," said Mr. Merrywhistle, "that I were to take you away from this place, and put you somewhere where you could learn dress-making or needle-work?"

She gave him a grateful and surprised look. "I don't think it 'd answer, Sir. I knows lots o' gals who tried to git a livin' by needle-work, and couldn't do it. I knows some as set up till two o'clock in the mornin', and got up agin at eight, and then couldn't earn enough to git a shoe to their foot. And they couldn't always git work: they'd go for weeks and couldn't git a stitch."

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Mr. Merrywhistle, who was as ignorant as a child in such matters. "What did they do then?"

Blade-o'-Grass laughed recklessly. "Do! what do you think? Beg, or—somethin' else."

He was pained by her manner, and said, "My poor child, I have only come here out of kindness, and to try if I could do some good for you."

"I know, Sir," she said, gratefully; "you've always been kind to me as long as I can remember; I don't forget, Sir. But there's some things I know more about nor you do, Sir. A gal can't git a livin' by needle-work—leastways, a good many of 'em can't. There was a woman livin' in the next room: she worked 'er fingers to the bone, and couldn't git enough to eat. Last winter was a reg'lar 'ard un; and then she lost her work, and couldn't git another shop. She took to beggin', and was 'ad up afore the beak. She was discharged with a caution, I 'eerd. It was a caution to her: she died o' starvation in that there room!"

Grieved and shocked, Mr. Merrywhistle was silent for a little while; but he brightened up presently. He was sincerely desirous to do some tangible good for Blade-o'-Grass. He thought of the situations held by Ruth and Mary in the Postal Telegraph Office. Suppose he was to take Blade-o'-Grass away from the contaminating influences by which she was surrounded, give her decent clothes, and have her taught the system, so that she might be an eligible candidate? He could set some influence at work; Mr. Silver would do his best, and there were others also whom he could induce to interest themselves. He felt quite hopeful as he thought. He mooted the idea to Blade-o'-Grass. She listened in silence, and when she spoke, it was in a low voice, and with her face turned from him.

"I've seed them gals, and I'd like to be one of 'em; but—"

"But what, Blade-o'-Grass?" he asked, kindly, almost tenderly; for there was a plaintiveness in her voice that deeply affected him.

"They must be able to read, mustn't they?"

"Oh yes; they would be useless without that."

"And they must be able to write too. Where do you think I learned to read and write? I don't know one letter from another."

Here was another difficulty, and a gigantic one; but it seemed as if each fresh obstacle only served to expand Mr. Merrywhistle's benevolent heart.

"Why, then," he said, cheerfully, "suppose we teach you to read and write? You'd learn quickly, I'll be bound."

A sudden rush of tears came to her eyes, and she sat down on the floor, and sobbed, and rocked herself to and fro.

"It's too late!" she cried. "Too late!"

Too late! The very words used by Robert Truefit. They fell ominously on Mr. Merrywhistle's ears. He asked for an explanation; but he had to wait until the girl's grief was spent, before he received an answer. She wiped her eyes in a manner that showed she was mad with herself for giving way to such emotion, and turned on her would-be benefactor almost defiantly.

"Look 'ere," she said, in a hard, cold voice: "all them gals are what you call respectable, ain't they?"

"Yes, my child."

"Don't call me your child; it 'urts me—oh, it 'urts me." She was almost on the point of giving way again; but she set her teeth close, and shook herself like an angry dog, and so checked the spasms that rose to her throat. "They must show that they're respectable, mustn't they, or they couldn't git the billet?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, I ain't respectable, as you call it; 'ow can I be? A nice respectable gal I'd look, comin' out of a orfice! Why, they've got nice warm clothes, every one of 'em, and muffs and tippets, and all that. I've seed 'em, lots of times."

"But you can leave your past life behind you," urged Mr. Merrywhistle, overleaping all obstacles; "you can commence another life, and be like them."

"Be like them! I can't be. It's too late, I tell you. And I'll tell you somethin' more," she added, slowly and very distinctly: "I wouldn't leave Tom Beadle to be the best-dressed gal among 'em."

"Why?"

"Why!" she echoed, looking into his face with wonder. "Why! Tom Beadle's been the best friend I ever 'ad. He's give me grub lots and lots o' times. When I was a little kid, and didn't know what was what; when the tiger was a-tearin' my very inside out; Tom Beadle's come and took pity on me. No one else but 'im did take it. I should 'ave starved a 'undred times, if it 'adn't been for Tom. Why, it was 'im as set me up for a flower-gal, and 'im as took me to the theaytre, and 'im as told me I should lick Poll Buttons into fits. And so I did, when I 'ad a nice dress on; they all said so. And there's another reason, if you'd care to know. No, I won't tell you. If you arks about 'ere, I dare say you can find out, and if you wait a little while, you'll find out for yourself." She stood up boldly before him, and said, in a low, passionate voice, "I love Tom, and Tom loves me! I wouldn't leave 'im for all the world. I'll stick to 'im and be true to 'im till I die."

Here was an end to Mr. Merrywhistle's benevolent intentions; he had nothing more to urge. The difficulties Blade-o'-Grass herself had put in the way seemed to him to render her social redemption almost impossible. Blade-o'-Grass saw trouble in his face, and said, as if he were the one who required pity:

"Don't take on, Sir; it can't be 'elped. Next to Tom, no one's been so good to me as you've been. Perhaps I don't understand things as you would like me to understand 'em. But I can't 'elp it, Sir."

Mr. Merrywhistle rose to go. He took out his purse, and was about to offer Blade-o'-Grass money, when she said, in an imploring tone:

"No, Sir, not to-night; it 'll do me more good if you don't give me nothin' to-night. I shall be sorry to myself afterward, if I take it. And don't believe, Sir, that I ain't grateful! Don't believe it!"

"I won't, my poor girl," said Mr. Merrywhistle, huskily, putting his purse in his pocket. "I am sorry for all this. But, at all events, you can promise me that if you want a friend, you'll come to me. You know where I live."

"Yes, Sir; and I'll promise you. When I don't know which way to turn, I'll come to you."

He held out his hand, and she kissed it, and went down stairs with him with the candle, to show him the way. He walked home with a very heavy feeling at his heart. "There's something wrong somewhere," was his refrain. He was conscious that a great social problem was before him, but he could find no solution for it. Indeed, it could not be expected of him. He was ready enough (too ready, many said) with his sixpences and shillings when his heart was stirred, but he was not a politician.

When Blade-o'-Grass re-entered her cheerless room, she set the candle on the table and began to cry. Her heart was very sore, and she was deeply moved at Mr. Merrywhistle's goodness. She started to her feet, however, when she heard the sounds of a well-known step on the stairs. Wiping her eyes hastily, she hurried into the passage with the candle. Tom Beadle smiled as he saw the light. He was a blackguard and a thief, but he loved Blade-o'-Grass.

"I've got some trotters, old gal," he said, when they were in their room, "and 'arf a pint o' gin. Why, I'm blessed if you 'aven't been turnin' on the water-works agin!"

Her eyes glistened at the sight of the food.

"Look 'ere, old woman," said Tom Beadle, with his arm round her waist. "'Ere's a slice o' luck, eh?" And he took out a purse and emptied it on the table. A half-sovereign and about a dozen shillings rolled out. She handled the coins eagerly, but she did not ask him how he came by them.

Half an hour later, Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass, having finished their supper, were sitting before the fire, on which the girl had thrown the last shovelful of coals. In the earlier part of the night she had been sparing of them; but when Tom came home rich, she made a bright blaze, and enjoyed the comforting warmth. Tom sat on the only chair, and she on the ground, with her arm thrown over his knee. She was happy and comfortable, having had a good supper, and seeing the certainty of being able to buy food for many days to come. Then she told him of Mr. Merrywhistle's visit, but did not succeed in raising in him any grateful feeling. All that he saw was an attempt on the part of Mr. Merrywhistle to take Blade-o'-Grass away from him, and he was proportionately grateful to that gentleman.

"I'd 'ave punched 'is 'ead, if I'd been 'ere," was Tom's commentary.

"No, Tom, you wouldn't," said Blade-o'-Grass, earnestly. "He only come to try to do me some good, and he's give me money lots o' times."

"He didn't give you any to-night," grumbled Tom.

"He wanted to, but I wouldn't take it; I couldn't take it."

"Blessed if I don't think you're growin' soft, old woman! Wouldn't take his tin!"

"Somethin' come over me, Tom; I don't know what. But he'll make it up to me another time."

There was a soft dreaminess in her tone, as she lay looking into the fire with her head upon Tom's knee, that disarmed him. He took a good drink of gin-and-water, and caressed her face with his hand. Just then the candle went out. Blade-o'-Grass placed her warm cheek upon Tom's hand. They sat so in silence for some time. Tender fancies were in the fire even for Blade-o'-Grass. As she gazed she smiled happily, as she had done in her sleep. What did she see there? Good

"PRESSING HER BABE TO HER BOSOM, SHE WAITED."

God! A baby's face! So like herself, yet so much brighter, purer, that thrills of ineffable happiness and exquisite pain quivered through her. Eyes that looked at hers in wonder; laughing mouth waiting to be kissed. It raised its little hands to her, and held out its pretty arms; and she made a yearning movement toward it, and pressed her lips to Tom's fingers, and kissed them softly, again and again, while the tears ran down her face.

"Oh, Tom!" she whispered, "'ow I love you!"

What a rock for her to lean upon! What a harbor for her to take shelter in!

She fell into a doze presently, and woke in terror.

"What's the matter, old gal?" asked Tom, himself nodding.

And then she gasped, between her sobs, that she dreamed it was born with a tiger in its inside!

Hark! What was that? Heavy steps coming up stairs. No shuffling; measured, slow, and certain, as though they were billets being lifted from stair to stair. Tom started to his feet. Nearer and nearer came the sounds.

"Give me the money, Bladergrass; give me the money, or you might get into trouble too!" He tore the money out of her pocket; when he came in he had given it to her to keep house with. Then he cried, "The purse! Where's the purse? Throw it out on the tiles—put it on the fire!"

"I 'aven't got it, Tom," answered Blade-o'-Grass, hurriedly, her knees knocking together with fright. "What's up?"

"The peelers! Don't you 'ear 'em? Curse the light! why did it go out? If they see the purse, I'm done for!"

They groped about in the dark, but could not find it. For a moment the steps halted outside the door. Then it opened, and the strong light from the policemen's bull's-eye lamps was thrown upon the crouching forms of Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass.

"You're up late, Tom," said one of the policemen.

"Yes," said Tom, doggedly, and with a pale face; "I was jist goin' to bed."

The policeman nodded carelessly, and kept his eye upon Tom, while his comrade searched about the room.

"Got any money, Tom?"

"What's that to you?"

"Come, come; take it easy, my lad. You haven't been long out, you know."

"And what o' that?" exclaimed Tom, beginning to gather courage, for the policeman's search was almost at an end, and nothing was found. "You can't take me up for not bein' long out."

"But we can for this," said the second policeman, lifting a purse from the mantel-shelf. "Is this yours, Sir?"

A man, who had been lingering by the door, came forward and looked at the purse by the light of the lamp. "Yes, it is mine."

"And is this the party?"—throwing the light full upon Tom Beadle's face. He bore it boldly; he knew well enough that the game was up.

"I can't say; the purse was snatched out of my hand suddenly, and I didn't see the face of the thief. I followed him, as I told you, and saw him run down this alley."

"And a nice hunt we've had! Been in a dozen houses, and only came to the right one at last. How much was in the purse, Sir, did you say?"

"Twenty-three shillings—a half-sovereign, and the rest in silver."

"Now, Tom, turn out your pockets."

Tom did so without hesitation. A half-sovereign and twelve shillings were placed on the table.

"Just the money, with a shilling short. What have you been having for supper, Tom?"

"Trotters."

"Ay; and what was in the bottle?"

"Gin, of course."

"Trotters, fourpence; gin, eightpence. That's how the other shilling's gone, Sir. Come along, Tom; this 'll be a longer job than the last.

As Tom nodded sullenly, Blade-o'-Grass, who had listened to the conversation with a face like the face of death, sank to the ground in a swoon. The policemen's hands were on Tom, and he struggled to get from them.

"Come, come, my lad," said one, shaking him roughly; "that's no good, you know. Best go quietly."

"I want to go quietly," cried Tom, with a great swelling in his throat that almost choked his words; "but don't you see she's fainted? Let me go to her for a minute. I hope I may drop down dead if I try to escape!"

They loosened their hold, and he knelt by Blade-o'-Grass, and sprinkled her face with water. She opened her eyes, and threw her arms round his neck.

"Oh, Tom!" she cried; "I thought—thought—"

"Now, my girl," said the policeman, raising her to her feet in a not unkindly manner; "it's no use making a bother. Tom's got to go, you know. It isn't his first job."

"Good-by, old gal," said Tom, tenderly; "they can't prove any thin'. They can't lag me for pickin' up a empty purse in the street; and as for the money, you know 'ow long I've 'ad that, don't you?"

She nodded vacantly.

"That's well trumped-up, Tom," said the policeman; "but I don't think it 'll wash."

Tom kissed Blade-o'-Grass, and marched out with his captors. When their steps had died away, Blade-o'-Grass shivered, and sank down before the fire, but saw no pictures in it now to bring happy smiles to her face.

HELP THE POOR.

MERRY peals of bells herald the advent of a bright and happy day. Care is sent to the right-about by those upon whom it does not press too heavily; and strangers, as they pass each other in the streets, are occasionally seen to smile amiably and cheerfully—a circumstance sufficiently rare in anxious, suspicious London to be recorded and made a note of. But the great city would be filled with churls indeed if, on one day during the year, the heart was not allowed to have free play. The atmosphere is brisk and clear, and the sun shines through a white and frosty sky. Although the glories of spring and summer are slumbering in the earth, nature is at its best; and, best thing of all to be able to say, human nature is more at its best than at any other time of the year. The houses are sweet and fresh, and smiles are on the faces and in the hearts of the dwellers therein. Men shake hands more heartily than is their usual custom, and voices have a merry ring in them, which it does one good to hear. It is an absolute fact that many men and women to-day present themselves to each other unmasked. Natural kindliness is in the enjoyment of a pretty fair monopoly, and charity and good-will are preached in all the churches. One minister ends an eloquent exordium with "God help the poor!" and the majority of his congregation whisper devoutly, "Be it so!"—otherwise, "Amen!"

In the church where this is said are certain friends of ours whom, I hope, we have grown to respect; Mr. and Mrs. Silver with their flock, and Robert Truefit with his. Mr. Merrywhistle has brought Robert Truefit and the Silvers together, to their mutual satisfaction; and Robert has agreed to spend Christmas-day in Buttercup Square with his family — wife and four young ones. Thus it is that they are all in church together. They make a large party—fourteen in all, for Mr. Merrywhistle is with them—and there is not a sad heart among them.

"If I had been the minister preaching," says Robert Truefit to Mrs. Silver, as they come out of church, "I should not have ended my sermon with 'God help the poor!'"

"With what, then?"

"With 'Man, help the poor!'" answered Robert Truefit, gravely.

Here Charley and Ruth come forward with a petition. They want permission to take a walk by themselves; they will be home within an hour.

"Very well, my dears," says Mrs. Silver; "don't be longer, if you can help it."

It is Ruth who has suggested the walk, and she has a purpose in view which Charley does not know of as yet. But Charley is happy enough in his ignorance; a walk on such a day with his heart's best treasure by his side is heaven to him. He is inclined to walk eastward, where glimpses of the country may be seen; but she says, "No, Charley, please; you must come my way." Perfectly contented is he to go her way, and they walk toward the City.

"You remember the day we went to the Exhibition, Charley?"

What a question to ask him! As if it has not been in his thoughts ever since, as if they have not talked of it, and lingered lovingly over the smallest incidents, dozens and dozens of times! But he answers simply, "Yes, Ruth."

"And what occurred when we came back, Charley?"

"The poor girl, do you mean, Ruth?"

"Yes, the poor girl—so much like me!"

"I remember."

"I have never forgotten her, Charley dear! I want to pass by the spot where we met her, and if I see her, I want to give her something. I should dearly like to do so to-day. Do you remember, Charley?—when we saw her, she had not a bit of bread in the cupboard. Perhaps she has none to-day."

"Take my purse, Ruth, and let us share together."

"I shall tell her, Charley, that it is half from you."

"Yes, my dear."

But though they walk past the spot, and, retracing their steps, walk past it again and again, and although Ruth looks wistfully about her, she sees nothing of Blade-o'-Grass. They walk homeward, Charley very thoughtful, Ruth very sad.

"Come, Ruth," says Charley, presently, "we must not be unhappy to-day. Let us hope that the poor girl is provided for; indeed, it is most reasonable to believe so."

"I hope so, Charley, with all my heart."

"What you hope with all your heart, dear Ruth, is sure to be good and true. Is there any thing else you hope with all your heart?"

There is a tender significance in his tone, and she glances at him shyly and modestly, but does not answer.

"You can make this happy day even happier than it is, Ruth; you can make it the happiest remembrance of my life if you will say Yes to something!"

Her voice trembles slightly as she asks, "To what, Charley?"

"Let me tell our dear parents how I love you.

Let me ask them to give you to me. Is it Yes, Ruth dear?"

"Yes, dear Charley." But so softly, so tenderly whispered, that only ears attuned as his were could have heard the words.

Presently,

"And do you love me with all your heart, Ruth?"

"With all my heart, Charley."

Oh, happiest of happy days! Ring out, sweet bells! A tenderer music is in your notes than they have ever yet been charged with!

It is twilight, and all the elderly people are in the parlor in Buttercup Square. The children are in another room, engaged in mysterious preparation.

"I think we shall have snow soon," says Mr. Merrywhistle.

"I'm glad of it," says Robert Truefit. "Something seems to me wanting in Christmas when there is no snow. When it snows, the atmosphere between heaven and earth is bridged by the purity of the happy time."

Mrs. Silver is pleased by the remark; the fire-light's soft glow is on her face. Charley enters, and bends over her chair.

"My dear mother," he whispers.

She knows in an instant, by the tremor in his voice, what he is about to say. She draws him to her, so that the fire-light falls on his face as well as on hers.

"Is it about Ruth?" she asks, softly.

"Yes, yes," he answers, in a tone of eager wonder. "How did you know?"

She smiles sweetly on him.

"I have known it for a long time, Charley. Have you spoken to her?"

"Yes; and this is the happiest day I have ever known. Oh, mother, she loves me! She gave me permission to ask you for her."

Mrs. Silver calls her husband to her side.

"Charley has come to ask for Ruth, my dear."

"I am glad of it. Where is Ruth?"

"I will bring her," says Charley, trembling with happiness.

"Did I not tell you, my dear?" Mrs. Silver asks of her husband.

"It is a happy Christmas, indeed," he answers.

Ruth is glad that it is dark when she enters the room. Mrs. Silver folds the girl in her arms.

"My darling child! And this wonderful news is really true?"

"Yes, my dearest mother," kissing Mrs. Silver's neck, and crying.

"What are you people conspiring together about?" asks Mr. Merrywhistle, from the window.

"Come here, and join the conspirators," says Mrs. Silver. "Our plots will fail without your assistance and consent."

Mr. Merrywhistle joins the party by the fire, and Robert Truefit steals quietly out of the room.

"It is eighteen years this Christmas," says Mrs. Silver, "since Ruth was given to us. She has been a comfort and a blessing to us, and will continue to be, I am sure." Ruth sinks on her knees, and hides her face in Mrs. Silver's lap. This true woman lays her hand on Ruth's head, and continues: "It is time that Ruth should know who is her real benefactor."

"Nay, my dear madam," expostulates Mr. Merrywhistle, blushing like a girl.

"My dear friend," says Mrs. Silver, "it is necessary. A great change will soon take place in Ruth's life, and your sanction must be given.—Ruth, my dear, look up. Before you were born, this friend—whom we all love and honor—came to me and asked to be allowed to contribute out of his means toward the support of our next child. You can understand with what joy his offer was accepted. Shortly afterward, my dear—eighteen years ago this day—you came to us, and completed our happy circle. You see before you your benefactor—your father—to whom you owe every thing; for all the expense of your training and education has been borne by him. It is right that you and Charley should know this. And, Charley, as but for this our dearest friend the happiness which has fallen upon you could not have been yours, it is of him you must ask for Ruth."

"Sir—" says Charley, advancing toward Mr. Merrywhistle.

"Not another word," cries Mr. Merrywhistle, with Ruth in his arms; "not another word about me, or I'll go and spend my Christmas-eve elsewhere. If, as Mrs. Silver says, my consent is necessary, I give you Ruth with all my heart."—He kisses Ruth, and says: "A happy future is before you, children. No need for me to tell you where your chief love and duty lie—no need for me to remind you to whose parental care and good example you owe all your happiness. To me, an old man, without kith or kin, their friendship and love have been priceless; they have brightened my life. It comes upon me now to say, my dear girl and boy, that once—ah, how many years ago!—such a prize as the love which animates you seemed to be within my reach; but it slipped from me, and I am an old man now, waiting to hear my name called. Cling to your love, my dears; keep it in your hearts as a sacred thing; let it show itself daily in your actions toward each other: it will sweeten your winter when you are as old as I am, and every thing shall be as bright and fresh to you then as in this your spring-time, when all the future before you seems carpeted with flowers. Ruth, my child, God bless you! Charley, I am proud of you! Let your aim be to live a good life."

Mrs. Silver kisses the good old man, and they sit round the fire undisturbed; for it appears to be understood in the house that the parlor must not be invaded until permission is given. It is settled that Charley and Ruth shall wait for twelve months; that Charley shall be very saving; that Ruth shall leave her situation and keep house for the family, so that she shall enter her own home competent to fulfill the duties of a wife. But, indeed, this last clause is scarcely necessary; for all Mrs. Silver's girls have been carefully instructed in those domestic duties, without a knowledge of which no woman can be a proper helpmate to the man to whom she gives her love.

The shadows thicken, and the snow begins to fall. There is peace without, and love within. Mrs. Silver, as she watches the soft snow-flakes, thinks that it will be just such a night as that on which, eighteen years ago, she and her husband brought Ruth home from Stoney Alley. She recalls every circumstance of her interview with the landlady, and hears again the pitiful story of the motherless babe. Then she looks down upon the pure, happy face of Ruth, and her heart is filled with gratitude to God.

And Ruth's twin sister, Blade-o'-Grass?

She was sitting in the same miserable attic from which Tom Beadle was taken to prison. He was not in prison now, having escaped just punishment by (for him) a lucky chance. When Tom was brought before the magistrate, he told his trumped-up story glibly: he had picked up the empty purse in the street, and the money was the result of his own earnings. When asked how he had earned it, he declined to say; and he advanced an artful argument. The policeman had reckoned up the money which the man who had lost the purse said it contained—twenty-three shillings. Twenty-two shillings were found in Tom's pocket, and the other shilling was spent, according to the policeman's version, in trotters and gin. Not another penny, in addition to the twenty-two shillings, was discovered in the room. Now, said Tom, it wasn't likely that he would be without a penny in his pocket, and the fact that he had just the sum the purse had contained was simply a coincidence. He argued that it would be much clearer against him if a few coppers more than the actual money lost had been found. Of course this defense was received with derision by the police, and with discredit by the magistrate. But it happened that the prosecutor was too unwell to attend on the morning that Tom made his appearance in the police court, and he was remanded for a week. Before the week passed by the prosecutor died, and Tom was set free. Blade-o'-Grass was overjoyed; it was like a reprieve from death to her. But the police were angry at Tom's escape, and kept so sharp a watch on him that he found it more than ever difficult to live. I am not pleading Tom's cause, nor bespeaking compassion for him; I am simply relating certain facts in connection with him. When Christmas came, things were at their very worst. They had no Christmas dinner, and Tom was prowling about in search of prey.

On the night before Christmas Blade-o'-Grass listened to the merry bells with somewhat of bitterness in her soul. Every thing about her was so dreary, the prospect of obtaining food was so faint, that the sound of the bells came to her ears mockingly. What she would have done but for her one comfort and joy, it is difficult to say.

Her one comfort and joy. Yes, she had a baby now, as pretty a little thing as ever was seen. All her thought, all her anxiety, were for her child. Blade-o'-Grass possessed the same tenderness of nature that had been so developed in Ruth as to make her a pride of womanhood. How proud Blade-o'-Grass was of her baby! How she wondered, and cried, and laughed over it! As she uncovered its pretty dimpled face, and gazed at it in worship, all the bitterness of her soul at the merry sound of the bells faded away, and for a little while she was happy. She talked to the babe, and, bidding it listen to the bells, imitated the glad sound with her voice, until the child's face was rippled with smiles. But the hard realities of her position were too pressing for her to be able to forget them for more than a few minutes. Tom had not been home since the morning, and she had had but little food during the day. Not for herself did she care; but her baby must be fed. If she did not eat and drink, how could she give milk to her child? "I'll go and arks Jimmy Wirtue for somethin'," she thought; and, so that her appeal to the old man might be fortunate, she cunningly took her baby out with her. Jimmy was playing All-Fours with Jack, who, having come into another fortune, was dissipating it recklessly, as usual, for the benefit of his remorseless foe.

"What do you want? What's that bundle in your arms?" growled Jimmy, as Blade-o'-Grass peeped into his parlor.

"It's my baby," said Blade-o'-Grass; "I've come to show it to you."

"And what business have you with a babby?" exclaimed Jimmy, in an excited manner. "Ain't you ashamed of yourself? Take it away; I don't want any babbies 'ere."

But Blade-o'-Grass pleaded her cause so meekly and patiently, and with so much feeling, that Jimmy was bound to listen and sympathize, hard as he was.

"Lookee 'ere," he said, harshly, holding up his finger, as she stood looking at him entreatingly: "it's now nigh on eighteen year ago since Mrs. Manning—you remember Mrs. Manning?"

"Oh yes," sighed Blade-o'-Grass.

"It's now nigh on eighteen year ago since she come round a-beggin' for you; and now you come round a-beggin' for your babby."

"I can't 'elp it," said Blade-o'-Grass; "don't speak to me unkindly; I am weak and 'ungry."

"Why, you was only a babby yourself then—what's the matter?"

Blade-o'-Grass was swaying forward, and would have fallen if he had not caught her. His tone was so harsh, that the poor girl's heart was fainting within her at the prospect of being sent away empty-handed. Jimmy assisted her into his chair; and without considering that he was about to upset Jack, who was sitting on the box, opened it, and produced a bottle of spirits. He gave her some in a cup, and she revived. Then, grumblingly, he took a sixpence out of a dirty bag, and gave it to her, saying,

"There! And don't you come botherin' me agin!"

How grateful she was! She made him kiss baby, and left him with that soft touch upon his lips. He stood still for a few moments with his fingers to his lips, wondering somewhat; but he recovered himself very soon, and, glaring at Jack, took swift revenge in All-Fours for his softness of heart, and ruined that shadowy creation for the hundredth time.

When Blade-o'-Grass quitted Jimmy's shop, she felt as if she would have liked to sing, she was so blithe and happy. She spent the whole sixpence, and treated herself to half a pint of stout. "This is for you, pet!" she said to her baby, as she drank. She drank only half of it; the other half she saved for Tom. But although she waited up, and listened to the bells—gratefully now—until long past midnight, Tom did not come home. And when she rose on Christmas morning, he was still absent. She wandered out to look for him, but could not find him; and then hurried back, hoping that he might have come in her absence. As the day wore on, she grew more and more anxious, and tormented herself with fears and fancies as to what could have happened to him. So she passed her Christmas-day. In the afternoon she fell asleep, with her baby in her arms. At first she dreamed of all kinds of terrors, and lived over again, in her dreams, many of the miseries of her past life; but after a time her sleep became more peaceful, and her mind wandered back to the time when, a child of three years of age, she sat on the stones in the dirty yard, looking in silent delight at the blades of grass springing from the ground.

When she awoke it was dark. She went to the window, shivering; it was snowing fast. All the food was gone, and she was hungry again. What should she do? Suddenly a terrible fear smote her. Baby was very quiet. She looked at the sleeping child's white face by the white light of the snow, and placed her ears to the pretty mouth. Thank God! she felt the child's warm breath. But it would wake up presently, and she had no milk to give. The child's lips and fingers were wandering now to the mother's bosom. She could not stand this agony of hunger and darkness and solitude any longer; she must go into the streets.

Out into the streets, where the snow was falling heavily, she went. She looked wistfully about for Tom, but saw no signs of him. Into the wider thoroughfares she wandered. How white they were! how pure! how peaceful! A virgin world had taken the place of the old; a new-born world seemed to lie before her, with its pure white page ready for the finger of God to write upon. She wandered on and on, until she came to a square. She knew it immediately—Buttercup Square. Why, here it was that Mr. Merrywhistle lived, and he had made her promise that she would come to him when she wanted a friend. "When I don't know which way to turn, I'll come to you," she had said. Well, she didn't know which way to turn. She walked slowly toward a house, through the shutters of which she could see pleasant gleams of light. It was Mrs. Silver's house, and she paused before it, and thought to herself, "I'll wait 'ere till I see 'im." And so, pressing her babe to her bosom, she waited, and listened to the music of happy voices that floated from the house into the peaceful square. Did any heavenly directed influence impel her steps hitherward? And what shall follow for poor Blade-o'-Grass? I do not know, for this is Christmas, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and I can not see into the future; but as I prepare to lay down my pen, I seem to hear the words that Robert Truefit uttered this morning—"Man, help the poor!"

THE END.

DINING WITH A MANDARIN.

WHEN an entertainment is about to be given by a mandarin, he sends three invitations to all those whom he wishes to partake of it—one on each of the two days preceding, and one immediately before it. These are generally received by the invited with much self-abasement and ceremony, and, unless it is owing to the most pressing and important circumstances, an invitation is never refused.

When the guests arrive they are received by the master of the house with certain laid-down ceremonies and prescribed speeches. Pointing to a chair with a profound reverence, he wipes it with his robe, and generally commences the conversation by expressing his delight at the great and unmerited honor the other has conferred upon his unworthy house by adorning it with his sublime presence, and earnestly hopes that his never-to-be-sufficiently-honored wife and most beautiful children are well in health. To which the guest will respond: that words fail to express his gratitude at being spared to bring his vile person into that most magnificent abode, and encounter the lightning glance of his lord: his unworthy wife and miserable offspring have but preserved life to be assured of his lord's health being all that they, his miserable slaves, could wish it to be; and so on. While these little amenities are being exchanged, the other guests walk about the room, admiring its furniture and adornments with all the high-flown eulogium which the language of the Flowery Land is so capable of expressing. To omit to do this would be a mark of the greatest ill-breeding.

It may be imagined that as all the compliments above specified (and a great many more) have to be paid to each guest, and that one person left out, or one necessary speech omitted, would be a culpable piece of rudeness, some little time is taken up before the way is led into the dining-hall. However, all ceremony and speech-ifying must at length have an end, and at last the guests are seated. The scene is a striking one: the walls are covered with native inscriptions, sometimes handsomely gilt, and adorned with banners and worked tapestry. When the mandarin is of the royal dynasty, the hangings are of yellow silk, emblazoned with dragons of such fierce and hideous aspects that if the one St. George encountered was any thing like them the saint must have had a hard time of it. The blue silk robes and white satin boots of the guests form a strong contrast of color to the surroundings, while the myriads of Chinese lanterns suspended from the ceiling throw an ample but subdued light upon a really very picturesque scene. The table, which is generally of a horseshoe form (in the centre of which a play is sometimes acted during dinner), is covered with little saucers piled one upon the other as we see plates in eating-houses at home. Some are uncovered, and contain sea-slugs, ginger, cumquats (a sort of small orange), and pickles and preserves of all sorts and descriptions. The first course is generally shark's-fin and bird's-nest soup, this latter much-vaunted delicacy appearing, at least to European notions, more like a solution of glue and lime-wash than any thing else. To these succeed roasted crabs and boiled and stewed mandarin-fish, resembling in appearance a large yellow carp the flesh of this (if it can be so described) is really very good, and would be palatable were it not served up with a sweet acrid sauce, which gives it a flavor that one would imagine oysters to have were they soaked in treacle and alum. Pork, roasted, stewed, and boiled, forms a staple portion of the repast, with wild fowl stuffed in a manner which must have been borrowed from the supper after the manner of the ancient Romans described in "Peregrine Pickle," and very rarely stewed mutton. The vegetable world is represented by yams, bringalls, and sweet-potatoes; and huge dishes of the inevitable curry fill up what few interstices there may remain in the corporalities of the guests, and conclude the more solid portion of the entertainment.

It must not be supposed that all these delicacies follow each other in the order above stated: all the food is placed on the board at the same time, minced into small portions, so as to give the least trouble to the guest partaking of it. The number of separate saucers containing eatables placed before a stranger denotes the honor or estimation in which he is held.

When the guests are all seated, their entertainer calls on them by signal to begin, when each lifts his chopsticks, carries the food to his mouth, and lays them down, all exactly at the same moment: the same order is preserved on each successive morsel, an officer beating time to preserve uniformity. Thus the festival is prolonged three or four hours, during which time, however, those who wish to be moderate may only raise the food to their lips, without actually partaking of it. Although each person has his own portion of food placed before him, and requires little or no waiting upon, there is generally a pause about the middle of the dinner, when the more solid portion of the eatables has been discussed.

It is at this period that the best view of the scene is obtained. Leaning back in their chairs, the fat old mandarins (they are nearly always fat) await with satisfied complacence the handing round of the warmed "samshu"—a spirit distilled from rice, something resembling rakee in taste, and the only liquid consumed, with the exception of tea.

Truly, gratified indulgence in the good things of this life spreads the same shade of smug contentment over the countenances of all men of a certain age, no matter what their nationality may be. Substitute bald heads and black coats for the flowing tails and blue silk robes, and a company of aldermen might be sitting before us, resting after their attacks on turtle and venison. It is very doubtful, however, whether these latter gentry—or at any rate their wives—would not be somewhat scandalized at the singing-girls who now appear upon the scene, one behind the chair of each person at table. The mission of these young ladies appears to be to enliven the portion of the entertainment which Europeans would call the dessert with their voices and lutes; when not thus actively engaged they employ themselves in peeling oranges or cracking nuts, either laying them beside each guest or putting them into his mouth. The old Celestials receive the eatables presented by the fair ones and listen to their music with the most stolid apathy.

Thus the feast goes on, songs and stories being diversified by sentiments and impromptu stanzas; the "samshu" passing quicker and quicker, and the faces of those partaking of it waxing redder and redder—an inevitable and peculiar effect this spirit has upon all Chinese—till, at last, on a signal from the host, the assembly breaks up, all the guests making two profound reverences toward their entertainer and each other.

Compliments of the same description that marked the commencement of the festival have now to be paid by the master of the house to each of his friends; he abusing the whole affair, and expressing his disgust and annoyance that such paltry, miserable fare has been placed before them; they, on the other hand, declaring that they have been entertained in a manner which they can hardly expect in the innermost recesses of heaven; and one by one they take their departure—the mandarins, probably, to indulge in the opium-pipe in "the secret chamber," the Europeans, if any have been present, to rush to their bungalows in search of some dish which they can be certain is not a dog or a rat. The remains of the feast are divided into equal portions, and sent to the house of each guest present at it, who next day returns a formal note of thanks for the entertainment which has been given to him, thus performing the last ceremony connected with a mandarin's dinner.

GERTY'S NECKLACE.

As Gerty skipped from babe to girl,
Her necklace lengthened, pearl by pearl;
Year after year it slowly grew,
But every birthday gave her two.
Her neck is lovely, soft, and fair,
And now her necklace glimmers there.

So cradled, let it sink and rise,
And all her graces symbolize:
Perchance this pearl, without a speck,
Once was as warm on Sappho's neck;
And where are all the happy pearls
That braided Cleopatra's curls?

Is Gerty loved? Is Gerty loath?
Or, if she's either, is she both?
She's fancy-free, but sweeter far
Than many plighted maidens are:
Will Gerty smile us all away,
And still be Gerty? Who can say?

But let her wear her precious toy,
And I'll rejoice to see her joy:
Her bauble's only one degree
Less frail, less fugitive, than we;
For time, ere long, will snap the skein,
And scatter all the pearls again.

THE HANCOCK SECRET.

By E. LYNN LINTON.

SHE was a mystery to her fellow-travelers in the third class. She was evidently accustomed to the first, by the instinctive movement she made for the strap by the window; she was as evidently unaccustomed to hard work, by the whiteness and smallness of her hand; for she drew off her glove inadvertently—a light kid glove, soiled certainly, but of perfect cut and quality—and showed her small fair hand, with marks round her fingers as if they had the habit of rings. She wore a large water-proof cloak, to the effectual concealment of her dress, which, however, crackled and rustled underneath like silk, and she had the unmistakable air of a high-bred lady; and though her face was so concealed by a thick Shetland veil there was no telling what her features were like, yet she was certainly young, and every thing about her seemed to presuppose beauty. Altogether she was an anomaly; her whole manner and style differing so strangely from the place in which she found herself and from the companions consequent.

Presently the train slackened, then stopped at Three Lanes Station, and the anomaly was observed to shrink farther back in her corner, and to hold her head bent a little down. On the platform was a footman in green and gold—the Hancock livery—standing a step or two behind a tall, handsome-looking man, both scanning the train as it passed. Outside the station was a carriage with a pair of bays, the like of which are not often seen.

"There's Hancock's bays," said a rough farmer lad seated opposite to the anomaly.

"Belike my lady's coming down," returned his father, to whom he had spoken. "I see her go up yesterday."

As he said this, the footman, running along the line, turned his eyes into the carriage, and nodded superciliously to Hodge; and Hodge and his son pulled their forelocks and said, "Good-morning, Sir," quite respectfully.

If the anomaly had not worn so thick a veil, Hodge would have seen her smile.

"My lady doesn't seem to have come, Sir John," then said the gorgeous creature in livery, touching his hat; and his master answered, quietly,

"So it seems: come to meet the next train," as if he really did not care much about the matter. But in his own heart he was fuming savagely; blaming her for not telegraphing if she had been prevented coming; blaming her for stupidity, carelessness, indifference, and all manner of evil things, as men do when they are angry, and before they can vent their wrath on the offending head.

Meanwhile the train went on. At the next station it dropped Hodge and his son, and about five miles further it stopped at an insignificant little station, where only third-class trains did stop; and here the anomaly alighted, and made her way across some fields to a small cottage set at the entrance to a by-lane—a pretty little place, with a rustic porch covered with roses and honeysuckles, and a trim garden full of old-fashioned flowers. The anomaly pushed open the wicket gate, and went up the paved walk and through the porch into the inner room, where an elderly woman sat watching a sick child.

"Well, Goody, and how is he to-day?" she asked, below her breath.

"Ah! my lady, I thought you would come. He's as bad, poor lamb! as he can be to live. I've looked for his last every minute, as you might say."

"Poor little fellow!" said the lady, tenderly. "Ah! he is ill, poor darling!" and tears were in her eyes as she sat down by the bedside and softly touched the wasted, feverish hand.

"The doctor says as how he can not last the night through if some change don't take place soon to-day," said the old woman. "You feel sure, my lady, don't you, as how I have done my best?" she added, anxiously.

"Your best, Goody! of course I do. Have we not trusted you? and don't I know you, dear old soul?" The lady spoke with tender affectionateness as she laid her hand on the old woman's shoulder.

"And Miss Annabella, do she feel satisfied in her mind?"

The pale face into which the woman was looking so anxiously flushed. "I am sure she does," she answered. "Make your mind easy on that; my sister is as well content with you as I. And now I must go. You will write and let us know how he goes on. If he does not live, it will not be for want of care: we must accept what ensues patiently. You will want money, in any case, and I have brought some. And now good-by, Goody. God bless thee, little one!" she added, stooping down and kissing the child's unconscious face; and with a strange feeling of mingled pity and relief (for she saw the boy could not live), human compassion and the relaxing of a heavy social burden warring together in her mind, she passed out of the cottage, and took her way back across the fields to the little station again, just in time for the up train.

This time she entered a first-class carriage. She got in, enveloped in her water-proof and masked in her Shetland veil, still an anomaly. At Three Lanes she got out, radiant in silk attire, and with an uncovered face, confessedly Lady Hancock. She was greeted with respectful bows and hat-touchings by the station-master and the porters.

"Sir John was here by the last down train, looking for you, my lady," said the station-master.

"I am so sorry! I fell asleep by the way, and so missed the station," said my lady, simply, looking divinely lovely as she lowered her eyes and blushed.

For my lady was not a great adept at telling stories, and generally managed to be betrayed by her blushes.

The station-master stared, but said nothing. He and the footman, and Sir John too, for that matter, had looked into every first-class carriage carefully, and had seen no Lady Hancock, awake or asleep; but my lady's little games were not his affairs; so he made a half-military salute, and looked as if he believed her. Presently the Hall carriage dashed up.

"You need not say that I have made this mistake," said Lady Hancock, hurriedly. "Sir John is nervous about my traveling alone, and he would not like it if he thought I could make such a blunder. I will go across the line, and will you keep the servant here till the London train has come in?"

It cost the poor lady something to weave up this little net-work of falsehood and pretenses, but more was at stake than the mere verbal truth of the moment; and if she was falsifying facts, it was not to do harm to any one, but to do good, and to shield the suffering. With which specious reasoning she strove to content her soul, and succeeded but ill.

When the train stopped, she slipped out of the little waiting-room, and stood on the platform close to an open carriage, just as the footman came bustling across; and just, too, as her maid alighted.

"Lor, my lady!" said the maid, "I have been in ever such a way about you! I looked and looked till the train began to move, and I never see your ladyship at all! I am glad you came all safe!"

"I do not think your eyes can be very good, Vince," was my lady's quiet rejoinder; and the station-master was more than ever puzzled at the why and wherefore of Lady Hancock's intricate manœuvres.

Then the carriage rolled away, and the pretty, sweet-mannered, easy-tempered lady left her character behind her—at least with one man.

She found her husband decidedly cross and sulky when she got home. He was not a very well-disciplined person, and he hated to be disappointed. And she found, moreover, her sister-in-law, Miss Annabella, in her own room with a nervous headache. The maid said she had had a hysterical attack to-day, and that the doctor had been in the house two hours, and looked grave when he left.

"Well, so you have condescended to come home at last!" said Sir John, disagreeably, as his pretty wife came into the room with a face full of the most penitent, coaxing, delicious smiles imaginable.

"Oh, John, I am so sorry!" she said; "but the Leytons came, and I missed the train!"

"And there was no telegraph at the post-office, of course?" said her husband, grimly.

"Ah! I never thought of that till too late," said Lady Hancock, with the old tell-tale blush. "But don't be angry, John dear, please. You may be sure I did not miss the train on purpose."

"You know how much I hate irregularity, Lucy," he answered, still grumblingly, if somewhat mollified. "Women are such muffs! They never can do things with precision or forethought!"

"Now, don't scold me, there's a darling," pleaded the lady, in her sweetest voice; and after a little more half-surly annoyance on his part, and a great deal of love-making on hers, peace was re-established between them, and Lady Hancock went up stairs to her sister-in-law.

"Lucy! Lucy dear! what is it?" exclaimed Annabella, starting up from her bed as Lady Hancock entered, and seizing her by both hands, while her white, wan face searched into hers for the warrant of death or of life.

"He can not live, dear! He was dying when I was there," she answered. "Poor little fellow! He will soon be no longer a perplexity to any of us!"

"My poor boy! my child!" murmured the girl. "Lucy, I can scarcely stay away from him; I ought to go."

"And betray every thing? No, dear; you can do no good to him now whatever, to yourself only infinite harm. The risk was awful to me to-day: you must be satisfied. And you must control yourself." For Annabella, weak by nature, and weaker still by suffering, had begun again to sob and lament so passionately that another nervous attack was imminent if she could not be calmed in time. No one in the world save Lady Hancock had any real power over this poor creature; but even she failed to-day; and in the midst of her exhortations her sister-in-law went off into strong hysterics, and the noise of her sobs and shrieks arrested Sir John as he was passing her door on his way to his own dressing-room. So this again was another ruffle on the not too smooth surface of the baronet's temper, and his wife had to bear the effects as well as she might. Poor Lady Hancock! she was the one to be pitied among them all. Without fault of her own, here she was entangled in the meshes of a disgraceful secret; a secret which, if known either in its reality or only as it might appear, would estrange her husband from his only sister forever, and anger him gravely with herself; a secret which forced her to tell lies and commit deceptions, to put herself in the power of others (as just now of the station-master at Three Lanes), and which was as burdensome to keep as it was impossible to impart, with apparently no end to the disasters and miseries involved.

But with Annabella's restored senses the difficulties of the day were by no means over. Late in the evening a knock came at the hall door—an unusual thing, as we all know, in the country, where even day visits are rare—and a loud, boisterous voice was heard asking for Lady Hancock, in the hall.

"Why, there's that beast Gay," said Sir John, with a frown. "What on earth brings him here to-night?"

Lady Hancock felt her face grow white, and for a moment she thought she should have fainted. Her husband looked at her sharply. An atmosphere of mystery makes itself felt; and Sir John was becoming suspicious and aroused. But he had not much time to note his wife's changing looks; for the servant announced Mr. Gay, and Mr. Gay came into the room.

A bold, handsome, showy man, with a loud voice and a great display of shirt front, a swagger in his walk, and a smile of assurance on his face—a man whose whole manner of being explained at first sight why a man like Sir John Hancock, haughty, reserved, and not of the most amiable temper, should hold him in supreme abhorrence. This was their visitor, Mr. Gay, the local attorney.

"Evening, Sir John—evening, my lady," said Mr. Gay, with familiar cordiality. "Late visitor, ain't I? Hope not more late than welcome? Ha, ha, ha!"

"An uncommonly late visitor, Mr. Gay," said Sir John, coldly.

"So I knew you'd think; but neighbors, you know, take liberties."

"No one takes liberties with me, Mr. Gay."

"Quite right, Sir John—quite right; nothing like keeping up the old blood—head well up, and all that! And how is Miss Annabella, my lady?" he asked, suddenly turning to Lady Hancock. "I don't see her down among you this evening."

"Miss Hancock is not very well to-day," answered the lady, while Sir John fidgeted impatiently, and seemed with difficulty to restrain himself from breaking out on the spot. It had struck him before that Gay had been too free toward both the ladies, his sister particularly.

"Sorry for that," said Mr. Gay, "as I have something to tell her this evening. Share list down this evening. Brazilians bad. Want instructions."

"I can carry any message, if absolutely necessary," said Lady Hancock, with lips that trembled in spite of herself; "but she is so ill I do not think she can attend to business to-night."

"I think she'd better, if she can," said the attorney, with meaning. "I scarcely like to hold on without instructions. You see, Brazilians returned won't do."

"Good Heavens! what rubbish are you talking there?" Sir John said, savagely. "Have you secrets and double meanings with Lady Hancock? for, on my soul, you have not spoken sense. What does it all mean?"

Gay laughed loudly. "'Secrets!' 'double meanings!' dear me, no, Sir John! But you see, as your honored father left some papers in my hands, and I have the management of a few hundreds belonging to your sister, Miss Annabella, I am bound to be careful how I work, else I should get the blame if any thing went wrong. Just so she happens to have a rather heavy investment in New Brazilian bonds, and I am naturally anxious to know her wishes, as things look bad to-night."

"But why was I never told of this investment?" Sir John asked, with as much temper as astonishment. "As my sister's guardian, and naturally having the right to be acquainted with all her affairs, this secret investment you talk of comes upon me with surprise; and I am most gravely displeased both with her and with yourself, Mr. Gay—that you should have encouraged this underhand proceeding, and that she should have entered into it."

"Well, you see, Sir John, all the ladies—bless 'em—like their little bits of secrets," said Mr. Gay, wagging his head with a knowing air. "One must oblige 'em, and let 'em believe they are doing it cleverly. Always let a woman think she takes you in, if that's what she likes; that's my advice, and I know the sex pretty well. That she should take you in is another matter."

Just at this moment the dogs were heard barking furiously.

"I think, my lady," said Mr. Gay, significantly, "if you will be so kind, you had better go up stairs and tell Miss Hancock that the Brazilian bonds are bad, and have been returned."

"Stay where you are, Lucy!" cried Sir John; "I will know the meaning of all this."

"Take advice, Sir John," said Mr. Gay, with an odd kind of authority in his voice. "If your sister likes to manage her little affairs in secret, let her."

"Do I want you to give me advice, fellow?" the baronet turned on him fiercely. "Mind your own business, and let me attend to mine."

"My lady—" pleaded Gay.

"How dare you speak to my wife, Sir?" interrupted Sir John; and as he spoke the dogs barked more furiously than before, and a man's step was heard on the gravel outside the window.

Mr. Gay and Lady Hancock exchanged looks, and Sir John caught the glance as it passed between them. He felt his brain reel, and the realities of life seemed to fail him. There was something—he did not know what—between his wife and this low, vulgar, insolent attorney; there was a mystery on hand, at his very doors, in his own house, and he had no clew as to what it all meant. His eyes grew so wild that his wife trembled and shrank visibly when he strode toward her and seized her arm roughly.

"What does it mean, Lucy?" he said, in a hollow voice. "Am I to believe that the very heaven itself is a lie?"

"I can not tell you any thing, John dear," said Lady Hancock, trembling.

A loud knock came to the door, the dogs still barking.

"Cursed fool!" said Mr. Gay, and made as though he would leave the room; but Sir John barred the way.

"Now we will see this comedy to the end," he said. "On your life, dare to stir!"

"Be advised, Sir John," said Mr. Gay, earnestly; "don't seek to know. Let the words of a man of business have some weight with you. Leave things alone; let them be obscure."

"Thanks for your friendly counsel, it comes too late," was Sir John's reply, made in a forced, unnatural voice. "Oh, here comes the mystery!" he added, as the door was flung open and the servant announced "Mr. Pedrone;" while Gay, muttering, "Quem Deus vult perdere," sat down in a chair, with his thumbs in his waistcoat armholes, and his fingers beating the devil's tattoo on his ample chest.

Lady Hancock looked simply scared; and then a small, dark, disreputable man came into the room, and bowed low to the trio gazing at him with such varied expressions.

"I fear to disturb honorable company," he said, in broken English; "but perhaps lord and lady will forgive poor man looking for wife. Wife here. Poor man seek her—want her—must have her, with honorable company permit. Lady know Pedrone speak true—Gay know Pedrone speak true. Wife here! Pedrone want wife!"

"What is the meaning of all this?" asked Sir John. "This vagabond says you both know. It seems to me that I have gone mad since this morning. Speak, Lucy! Gay, what is it?"

"Sir John, I warned you not to look into this matter," said Gay, still hard at work on the devil's tattoo. "You would have done better to have let my lady and me manage it between us. My lady, what had we better do?" He turned to Lady Hancock in his familiar way, and Sir John, making one stride toward him, caught him by the throat.

"Do you dare to speak to Lady Hancock as a confederate, and in my presence?" he said; but Gay shook him off, though the baronet was a powerful man enough.

"Don't make a fool of yourself, Sir John," he said, with perfect indifference. "Don't cry, Lady Hancock: I see nothing else for it—the truth must come out."

"Yes, yes; the truth—my wife!" said Pedrone.

"It will kill her!" sobbed Lady Hancock, shuddering.

"If it does—" The attorney shrugged his shoulders and rang the bell. "Tell Miss Hancock I want to speak to her," he said, when the servant came. "Now, Sir John, don't make a bad job into a worse one by your absurd passion," he continued, speaking with the same odd kind of authority he had used before, as one who knew what he was about. "I've done my best for you all, and at some cost, as Lady Hancock knows. Powers above, man! have some faith in your fellow-men, and don't think no one but yourself either wise or honest! You alienate your best friends—you do indeed, Sir John—by your suspicions and tempers; and you must not take it ill that I take this liberty of speaking to you."

All this while Mr. Gay had been holding Sir John's hands, and standing so that he kept him from seeing Lady Hancock or Pedrone; and his words and action took the baronet so completely by surprise that, for the moment, he was mute and passive.

During this conversation Lady Hancock said, in a low, rapid whisper, "Take Merton's name—it will be worth your while."

"How much?" said Pedrone.

"Two thousand."

"Done!"

And at the word "done" came in Annabella Hancock. She did not scream or faint; but she walked straight up to where Pedrone stood, and looked him full in the face.

"You here again!" she said, scornfully, with that strange courage which sometimes comes to timid creatures when they are fairly at bay.

He gave her a look of intelligence. "Yes, my lady," he said, with a low bow; "I have come for my wife."

"Shall we send for Merton?" said Lady

Hancock, wanting to arrest her sister's attention; but she never heeded, nor took her eyes off the man.

"And your wife will not go with you," she answered. "You may do your worst; she refuses."

"Annabella! perhaps you will tell me what all this means," said Sir John, shaking off Gay's hands, and stalking up to the group.

"It means, Sir John—" began Gay, but Sir John stopped him.

"If you say another word I will kick you out of this house," he said. "Now, Annabella."

"I am this man's wife," said Miss Hancock, "and he has come to claim me."

A dead silence fell among them all, broken only by Gay's quietly whistling "Walking in the Zoo" between his teeth.

"Am I mad, or are you?" cried her brother, looking at Annabella wildly.

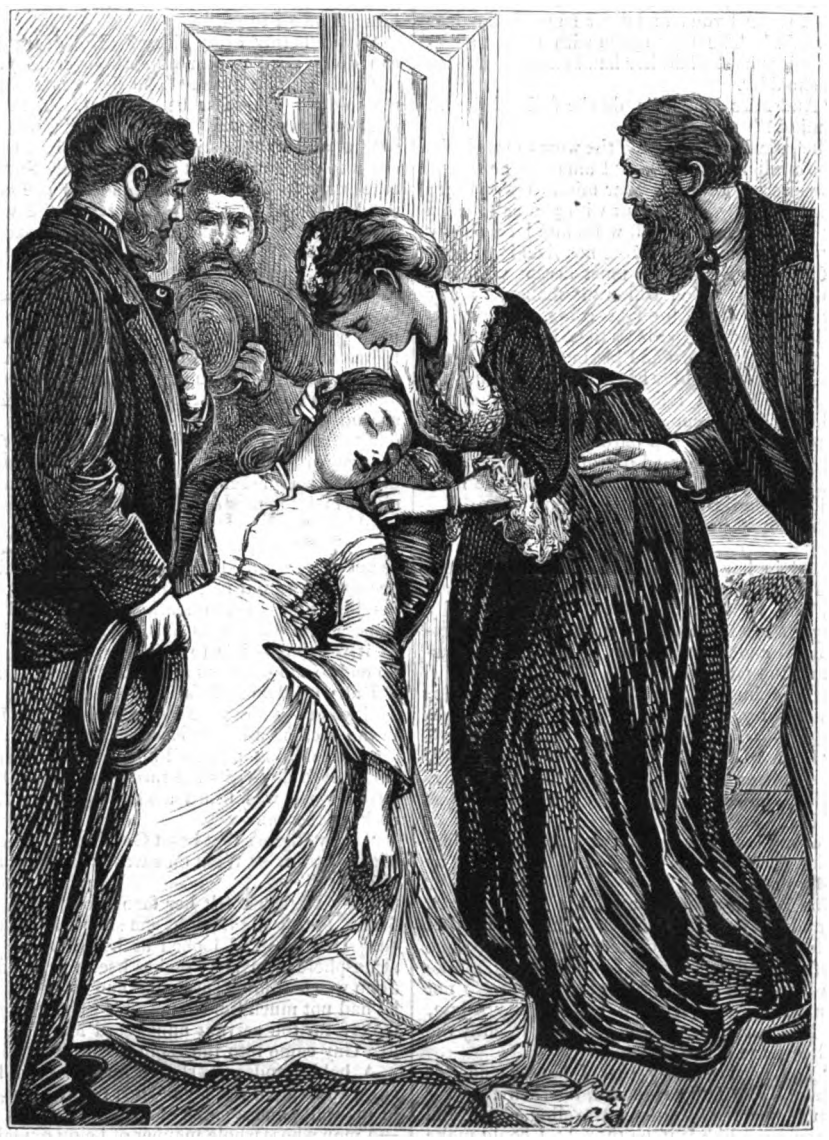
"Not you. I have been—I am," said the miserable girl. "But it is better to have it out at once, instead of dragging other people into my sin. Every one has been good to me. Mr. Gay has tried to protect me, so has Lucy; even my maid has offered to personate the 'wife' to give me time and so much freedom. But I am tired; I will brave it all. The child is dead, and he—he is to be bought off by money! You can do now as you think best, John; my part is done."

She gave a deep sigh, and sank back into a chair, fainting. When they tried to restore her they could not. She was dead! She had gone to rest at last, and by her death had brought her brother's forgiveness and her own assoilment.

And then the story came out; the old, sad story of a low-born scamp, with a temporary flush purse, aping the manners and circumstances of a gentleman; getting acquainted with a weak, impressionable girl; seducing her into a secret marriage on an absurd plea of political danger if it became known he was here; and in the end, when, too late, the fatal truth becoming known, to be silenced only at a great cost and an incessant terror, with perpetual danger of the untimely reappearance of the spectre kept in abeyance at the price of all that makes life pleasant. None of which did they dare tell the proud brother until such time as the poor girl lay dead, and he could accept as services rendered to her all the dangers which his wife and the attorney had run to keep the secret, and all the sacrifices they had made that she might be saved.

"You will forgive me, Lucy," said Sir John, as he took his wife's hand and kissed it tenderly. Gay had long ago taken off Pedrone, the Brazilian courier and Sir John Hancock's brother-in-law.

"And you will forgive my having a secret from you?" returned Lady Hancock, weeping. "My first and last, John!"



"SHE GAVE A DEEP SIGH, AND SANK BACK INTO A CHAIR, FAINTING."

"There are some sins which are virtues, and this was one of them," said Sir John, pressing her to his heart.

Many people after this wondered why it was that Sir John Hancock — fastidious, haughty, irascible Sir John—was always on such good terms with Gay, the attorney. Gay had nothing to recommend him, said society. He was vulgar and familiar; one of the most offensively mannered men to be found in a long summer's day, and none of the gentry about the place admitted him into their companionship on that account. To be sure, he was good-hearted; that was allowed on all hands; but when you had said that, you had said every thing; and Sir John Hancock was scarcely the man to care for heart so much as for breeding. Be that as it may, however, the fact was, that after this affair—which Gay was chiefly instrumental in keeping dark and smoothing over—the broad-chested and familiar attorney, who whistled before ladies, and stuck his thumbs into his waistcoat armholes while he played imaginary tunes with his splay fingers on his capacious chest, was a welcome guest at the Hall whenever he chose to come. It may be as well, however, to add that he came very seldom, and that when there he was visibly subdued.

One day, speaking of bad manners, Sir John Hancock said, pointedly, "Well, I once hated bad manners more than any thing else; but since I have known Gay better, I have known a man whose unselfishness, honesty, and real nobility of feeling so far outweigh his vulgarity that I have learned to accept this as one does accept a small flaw in any thing that else would be perfection. One doesn't come every day upon such a man as Gay; and, for my own part, I am proud of him, and not ashamed to own it."

THE BACHELORS' CHRISTMAS DINNER.

WE do not think that any better sermon could be preached in favor of the elevating and humanizing influences of matrimony than can be found in the accompanying illustration. Two old friends have met for their Christmas dinner. Both are bachelors, and the result is a bachelor's idea of festivity. This seems to be summed up in material comfort. The table is plentifully spread—at least there is no lack of mere edibles—but it does lack the nameless graces which only a woman's hand can give, the thousand little decorations which cast a charm over the family dinner-table. More than all this, it lacks the atmosphere of love; it lacks the music of baby voices, the confidential prattle of home affairs, the incoming of the Christmas guests, and the hearty greetings which are echoed through the large family circle of parents, children, aunts, cousins, and strangers bidden to the feast. Our two old friends have dined well, as is evident from their faces; but the dinner which they have eaten in tête-à-tête might have been eaten just as well on any day of the year, at any place in the world. It is utterly devoid of the sentiment of that festival in honor of the Christ-child which one can only truly keep in the bosom of his family, under his own vine and fig-tree, surrounded by those who are dear to him by the ties of kindred, and not in a fashionable restaurant or a lonely hotel parlor.

"HE LAUGHED AND DANCED, TO THE ADMIRATION OF BLADE-O'-GRASS."

look upon it as an amusing exhibition, for he was almost convulsed by laughter. Laughter! It wasn't laughter. It was a series of demoniac chuckles, that's what it was—demoniac chuckles. But I can't exactly describe what it was that set my blood boiling. It wasn't his demoniac chuckling alone; it was every thing about him—his manner, his expression, his extraordinary eyes, one of which looked like the eye of an infuriated bull, as if it were half inclined to fly out of its head at you, and the other as if it were the rightful property of the meekest and mildest of baa-lambs. Then his eyebrows—lapping over as if they were precipices, and as thick as blacking-brushes. Then his face, like a little sour and withered apple. Your pro-indiscriminate-charity men would not have behaved as he did. They would have asked me, How dare I—how dare I? —yes, that is what they would have said—how dare I encourage pauperism by giving money to little boys and girls and ragged men and women, whom I had never seen in my life before, whom I had never heard of in my life before? This fellow wasn't one of them. No, no, no; I say he wasn't one of them. I wouldn't swear that he wasn't drunk—no, I won't say that; tipsy, perhaps—no, not that either. Uncharitable of me—very. Don't laugh at me. You wouldn't have laughed at the poor little boy if you had seen him."

"I am sure we should not."

"That's like me again," cried the impetuous old bachelor, remorsefully; "throwing in the teeth of my best friends an accusation of inhumanity—yes, inhumanity—positive inhumanity. Forgive me; I am truly sorry. But that indiscriminate-charity question cropped up again to-day, and that, as well as this affair, has set my nerves in a jingle. A gentleman called upon me this morning, and asked me for a subscription toward the funds of an institution—a worthy institution, as I believe. I hadn't much to spare —I am so selfishly extravagant that my purse is always low—and I gave him half a sovereign. He took it, and looked at it and at me reproachfully. 'I was given to understand,' he said, in the meekest of voices—so meek, indeed, that I could not possibly take offense—'I was given to understand that from Mr. Merrywhistle, and in aid of such an institution as ours, I should have received a much larger contribution.'"

"That savored of impertinence," observed Mr. Silver.

"I dare say, Silver; I dare say. Another man might have thought so; but I couldn't possibly be angry with him, his manner was so humble—reproachfully humble. I explained to him that at present I couldn't afford more, and that, somehow or other, my money melted away most surprisingly. 'I hope, Sir,' he then said, 'that what I was told of you is not true, and that you are not in the habit of giving away money indiscriminately.' I could not deny it—no, indeed, I could not deny it; and I commenced to say, hesitatingly (feeling very guilty), that now and then— But he interrupted me with, 'Now and then, Sir! now and then! You will pardon my saying so, Mr. Merrywhistle, but it may not have struck you before that those persons who give away money indiscriminately are making criminals for us, are filling our prisons, are blowing a cold blast on manly self-endeavor, are crippling industry, are paying premiums to idleness, which is the offspring of the —hem!' And continued in this strain for more than five minutes. When he went away my hair stood on end, and I felt as if sentence ought to be pronounced upon me at once. And here, this very afternoon, am I caught again by a pitiful face—you should have seen it! I thought the poor boy would have died as I looked at him, and I gave away a shilling indiscriminately. Then comes this strange old fellow staring at me, sneering at me, shrugging his shoulders at me, and walking away with the unmistakable declaration, though he didn't declare it in words, that I wasn't fit to be trusted. As perhaps I'm not—as perhaps I'm not." And Mr. Merrywhistle blew his nose violently.

His friends knew him too well to interrupt him. The tea-things had been quietly cleared away while he was relieving his feelings. He had by this time got rid of a great portion of his excitement, and now, in his cooler mood, he looked round and smiled. At that moment a lad of about fifteen years of age entered the room. All their countenances brightened, as also did his, as he entered.

"Well, Charley," said Mr. Merrywhistle, as the lad, with frank face, stood before him, "been knocking any thing into 'pi' to-day?"

"No, Sir," replied Charley; "I'm past that now. I'm getting along handsomely, the overseer said."

"That's right, my boy; that's right. You'll be overseer yourself some day."

Charley blushed; his ambition had not yet reached that height of desire, and it seemed almost presumption to him to look so far ahead. The overseer in the printing-office where Charley was apprenticed was a great man in Charley's eyes; his word was law to fifty men and boys. The lad turned to Mr. Silver, and said, in a pleased tone,

"A new apprentice came in to-day, and swept out the office instead of me."

"So you are no longer knight of the broom?"

"No, Sir, and I'm not sorry for it; and there's something else. Dick Trueman, you know, Sir—"

"You told us, Charley; he was out of his time last week, and they gave him a frame as a regular journeyman."

"Yes, Sir; and he earned thirty-four shillings last week—full wages. And what do you think he did to-day, Sir?" And Charley's bright eyes sparkled more brightly. These small items of office news were of vast importance to Charley —almost as important as veritable history. "But you couldn't guess," he continued, in an eager tone. "He asked for three hours' holiday—from eleven till two—and he went out and got married!"

"Bless my soul!" exclaimed Mr. Merrywhistle; "he can't be much more than twenty-one years of age."

"Only a few weeks more, Sir. But he's a man now. Well, he came back at two o'clock, in a new suit of clothes, and a flower in his coat. All the men knew, directly they saw him, that he had asked for the three hours' holiday to get married in. And they set up such a clattering—rattling on their cases with their sticks, and on the stone with the mallets and planers—that you couldn't hear your own voice for five minutes, for every one of us likes Dick Trueman. You should have seen Dick blush when he heard the salute! He tried to make them believe that he didn't know what all the clattering was about; but they kept it up so long that he was obliged to come to the stone and bob his head at us. It makes me laugh only to think of it. And then the overseer shook hands with him, and Dick sent for three cans of beer, and all the men drank his health and good luck to him." Charley paused to take breath. The simple story, as he told it in his eager way, was a pleasant story to hear. Now came the most important part of it. Charley's eyes grew larger as he said, with much importance, "I saw her."

"Who?" they asked.

"Dick's wife. She was waiting at the corner of the street for him—and oh, she's Beautiful!"

"Quite a day of excitement, Charley," said Mr. Silver.

"There's something more, Sir."

"What is it, Charley?"

"Our wayz-goose comes off next week, Sir."

"Yes, Charley."

"Only two of the apprentices are asked, and I'm one of them," said Charley, with a ring of pardonable pride in his voice. "May I go?"

"Certainly, my boy," said Mr. Silver; and Mrs. Silver smiled approvingly, and told Charley to run and wash himself and have tea; and Charley gave them all a bright look, and went out of the room as happy a boy as any in all London.

Then said Mr. Merrywhistle,

"Charley's a good lad."

"He's our first and eldest," said Mrs. Silver, bringing forward a basket filled with socks and stockings wanting repair: "he will be a bright man."

Mr. Merrywhistle nodded, and they talked of various subjects until the sound of children's happy voices interrupted them. "Here are our youngsters," he said, rubbing his hands joyously; and as he spoke a troop of children came into the room.

MRS. SILVER'S HOME.

THERE were five of them, as follows:

The eldest, Charles, the printer's apprentice, fifteen years of age, with a good honest face and a bright manner: the picture of a happy boy.

Then Mary, fourteen years. She looked older than Charley, and, young as she was, seemed to have assumed a kind of matronship over the younger branches. That the position was a pleasing one to her and all of them was evident by the trustful looks that passed between them.

Then Richard, twelve years; with dancing eyes, open mouth, and quick, impetuous, sparkling manner: filled with electricity; never still for a moment together; hands, eyes, and every limb imbued with restlessness.

Then Rachel, eleven years; with pale face and eyes—so strangely watchful of every sound that it might almost have been supposed she listened with them. She was blind, and, unless her attention were aroused, stood like a statue waiting for the spark of life.

Lastly, Ruth: a full-faced, round-eyed child, the prettiest of the group; slightly willful, but of a most affectionate disposition.

Rachel inclined her head.

"There's some one here," she said.

"Who, my dear?" asked Mrs. Silver, holding up a warning finger to Mr. Merrywhistle, so that he should not speak.

Rachel heard his light breathing.

"Mr. Merrywhistle," she said, and went near to him. He kissed her, and she went back to her station by the side of Ruth.

They were a pleasant bunch of human flowers to gaze at, and so Mr. and Mrs. Silver and Mr. Merrywhistle thought, for their eyes glistened at the healthful sight. Ruth and Rachel stood hand in hand, and it was easily to be seen that they were necessary to each other. But pleasant as the children were to the sight, a stranger would have been struck with amazement at their unlikeness to one another. Brothers and sisters they surely could not be, although their presence there and their bearing to each other betokened no less close a relationship. They were not, indeed, related by blood, neither to one another, nor to Mr. and Mrs. Silver. They were Mrs. Silver's foundlings—children of her love, whom she had taken, one by one, to rear as her own, whom she had snatched from the lap of Destitution.

Her marriage was one of purest affection, but she was barren; and after a time, no children coming, she felt a want in her home. Her husband was secretary in a sound assurance office, and they possessed means to rear a family. Before their marriage, they had both dwelt in thought upon the delight and pure pleasure in store for them, and after their marriage she saw baby faces in her dreams. She mused: "My husband's son will be a good man, like his father, and we shall train him well, and he will be a pride to us." And he: "In my baby daughter I shall see my wife from her infancy, and I shall watch her grow to girlhood, to pure womanhood, and shall take delight in her, for that she is ours, the offspring of our love." But these were dreams. No children came; and his wife still dreamed of her shadow-baby, and yearned to clasp it to her bosom. Years went on—they had married when they were young—and her yearning was unsatisfied. Pain entered into her life; a dull envy tormented her, when she thought of homes made happy by children's prattle, and her tears flowed easily at the sight of children. Her husband, engrossed all the day in the duties and anxieties of his business, had less time to brood over the deprivation, although he mourned it in his leisure hours; but she, being always at home, and having no stern labor to divert her thoughts from the sad channel in which they seemed quite naturally to run, mourned with so intense a grief, that it took possession of her soul, and threatened to make her life utterly unhappy. One day he awoke to this, and quietly watched her; saw the wistful looks she cast about her, unaware that she was being observed; felt tears flowing from her eyes at night. He questioned her, and learned that her grief and disappointment were eating into her heart; that, strive as she would, her life was unhappy in its loneliness while he was away, and that the sweetest light of home was wanting.

"I see baby faces in my dreams," she said to him one night, "and hear baby voices—so sweet, oh, so sweet!" She pressed him in her arms, and laid his head upon her breast. "And when I wake, I grieve."

"Dear love," he said, all the tenderness of his nature going out in his words, "God wills it so."

"I know, I know, my love," she answered, her tears still flowing.

"How can I fill up the void in her life?" he thought, and gave expression to his thought.

Then she reproached herself, and asked his forgiveness, and cried, in remorse, "How could she, how could she grieve him with her sorrow?"

"I have a right to it," he answered. "It is not all yours, my dear. Promise me, you in whom all my life's cares and joys are bound, never to conceal another of your griefs from me."

She promised, and was somewhat comforted. This was within a couple of months of Christmas. A few nights before Christmas, as he was walking home, having been detained later than usual at his office, he came upon a throng of people talking eagerly with one another, and crowding round something that was hidden from his sight. It was bitterly cold, and the snow lay deep. He knew that nothing of less import than a human cause could have drawn that concourse together, and could have kept them bound together on such a night, and while the snow was falling heavily. He pushed his way through the crowd to the front, and saw a policeman gazing stupidly upon two forms lying on the ground. One was a man—dead; the other a baby—alive in the dead man's arms. He had them—the living and the dead—conveyed to the station-house; inquiries were set afoot; an inquest was held. Nothing was learned of the man; no one knew any thing of him; no one remembered having ever seen him before: and the mystery of his life was sealed by his death. He told his wife the sad story, and kept her informed of the progress, or rather the non-progress, of the inquiry. The man was buried, and was forgotten by all but the Silvers. Only one person attended the parish funeral as mourner, and that was Mr. Silver, who was urged to the act by a feeling of humanity.

"The poor baby!" said Mrs. Silver, when he came from the funeral—"what will become of it?"

In the middle of the night she told her husband that she had dreamed of the baby. "It stretched out its little arms to me."

Her husband made no reply; but a few nights afterward, having arranged with the parish authorities, he brought home the child, and placed it in his wife's arms. Her heart warmed to it immediately. A new delight took possession of her; the maternal instinct, though not fully satisfied, was brought into play. During the evening she said, "How many helpless orphans are there round about us, and we are childless!" And then again, looking up tenderly from the babe in her lap to her husband's face, "Perhaps this is the reason why God has given us no children."

From this incident sprang the idea of helping the helpless; and year after year an orphan child was adopted, until they had six, when their means were lessened, and they found they could take no more. Then Mr. Merrywhistle stepped in, and gave sufficient to lift another babe from Desolation's lap. This last was twin sister to Blade-o'-Grass, and they named her Ruth. From this brief record we pass to the present evening, when all the children are assembled in Mrs. Silver's house in Buttercup Square.

Some little time is spent in merry chat—much questioning of the children by Mr. Merrywhistle, who is a great favorite with them, and to whom such moments as these are the sweetest in his life. Charley tells over again the stirring incidents of the day, and they nod their heads, and laugh, and clap their hands, and cluster round him. Charley is their king.

"Come, children, sit down," presently says Mr. Silver.

They sit round the table, Charley at the head, next to Mrs. Silver; then come Ruth and Rachel, with hands clasped beneath the table-cloth; then Mary and Richard. Mr. Silver produces a book; they hold their breaths. The blind girl knows that the book is on the table, and her fingers tighten upon Ruth's, and all her ears are in her eyes. It is a study to watch the varying shades of expression upon her face. As Mr. Silver opens the book you might hear a pin drop. Ruth nestles closer to Rachel, and Charley rises in his excitement. Mr. Merrywhistle sits in the arm-chair, and, as he looks round upon the happy group, is as happy as the happiest among them. It is the custom every evening (unless pressing duties intervene) to read a chapter of a good work of fiction, and the reading-hour is looked forward to with eager delight by all the children. Last week they finished the "Vicar of Wakefield," and this week they are introduced to the tender romance of "Paul and Virginia." The selection of proper books is a grave task, and is always left to Mrs. Silver, who sometimes herself reads aloud.

"Where did we leave off last night, children?" asks Mr. Silver.

"Where Madame De la Tour receives a letter from her aunt," answered Mary.

"Yes, from her spiteful old aunt," adds Richard, "and where Paul stamps his feet and wants to know who it is that has made Virginia's mother unhappy."

A "Hush-sh-sh!" runs round the table; and Mr. Silver commences the beautiful chapter where Virginia gives food to the poor slave woman, and induces her master to pardon her. With what eagerness do the children listen to how Paul and Virginia are lost in the woods! They gather cresses with the young lovers, and they help Paul set fire to the palm-tree, and they see the Three Peaks in the distance. Then they come to the famous part where Paul and Virginia stand by the banks of a river, the waters of which roll foaming over a bed of rocks. "The noise of the water frightened Virginia, and she durst not wade through the stream; Paul therefore took her up in his arms, and went thus loaded over the slippery rocks, which formed the bed of the river, careless of the tumultuous noise of its waters." [Thinks Richard, "Oh, how I wish that I were Paul, carrying Virginia over the river!"] "'Do not be afraid,' cried Paul to Virginia; 'I feel very strong with you. If the inhabitant of the Black River had refused you the pardon of his slave, I would have fought with him.'" ["And so would I," thinks Richard, clenching his fists.] Night comes, and the lovers are almost despairing. Profound silence reigns in the awful solitudes. Will they escape? Can they escape? Paul climbs to the top of a tree, and cries, "Come, come to the help of Virginia!" But only the echoes answer him, and the faint sound of "Virginia, Virginia!" wanders through the forest. Despairing, they try to comfort each other, and seek for solace in prayer. Hark! they hear the barking of a dog. "Surely," says Virginia, "it is Fidèle, our own dog. Yes, I know his voice. Are we, then, so near home? At the foot of our own mountain?" So they are rescued, and this night's reading ends happily. The delight of the children, the intense interest with which they hang upon every word, can not be described. Their attention is so thoroughly engrossed, that the figures of the young lovers might be living and moving before them. When Mr. Silver shuts the book, a sigh comes from the youthful audience. A pause ensues, and then the children talk unreservedly about the story, and what the end will be—all but Ruth, who is too young yet to form opinions. It is of course this and of course that with them all, and not one of them guesses the truth, or has any idea of the tragic ending of the story.

"Charley," says little Ruth, "you are like Paul."

They all clapped their hands in acquiescence.

"But where's my Virginia?" asks Charley.

"I'll be Virginia," cries Ruth, somewhat precociously; "and you can carry me about where you like."

They all laugh at this, and Ruth is quite proud, believing that she has distinguished herself. It is strange to hear the blind girl say, "I can see Paul with Virginia in his arms." And no doubt she can, better than the others who are blessed with sight. The three grown-up persons listen and talk among themselves, and now and then join in the conversation. The clock strikes—nine. It is a cuckoo-clock, and the children listen to the measured "Cuck-oo! Cuck-oo!" until the soulless bird, having, with an egregious excess of vanity, asserted itself nine times as the great "I am" of all the birds in town or country, retires into its nest, and sleeps for an hour. Then a chapter from the Bible and prayers, and in the prayers a few words to the memory of two—a brother and a sister—who have gone from among them. For last year they were seven; now they are five. Their faces grow sad as the memory of their dear brother and sister comes upon them in their prayers, and "Poor Archie!" "Poor Lizzie!" hang upon their lips. The night's pleasures and duties being ended, the three youngest children go to bed, the last kind nod and smile being given to Ruth, sister to poor Blade-o'-Grass, who lingers a moment behind the others, and, with her arm round Rachel's neck, cries "Cuck-oo! Cuck-oo!" as her final good-night. But the proud bird in the clock takes no notice, and preserves a disdainful silence, although Ruth, as her custom is, waits a moment or two, and listens for the reply that does not come. Charley and Mary stop up an hour later than the others, reading; but before that hour expires, Mr. Merrywhistle bids his friends good-night, and retires.

MR. MERRYWHISTLE MEETS THE QUEER LITTLE OLD MAN.

But not to his bed. He was restless, and, the night being a fine one, he strolled out of Buttercup Square into the quiet streets. It was a favorite custom of his to walk along the streets of a night with no companions but his thoughts. Almost invariably he chose the quiet streets, for there are streets in London—north and south, and east and west—which never sleep; streets which are healthy with traffic in the day, and diseased with traffic in the night.

Mr. Merrywhistle walked along and mused, in no unhappy frame of mind. A visit to the Silvers always soothed and comforted him; and on this occasion the sweet face of Mrs. Silver, and the happy faces and voices of the children, rested upon him like a peaceful cloud. So engrossed was he, that he did not heed the pattering of a small urchin at his side, and it was many moments before he awoke from his walking dream, and became conscious of the importunate intruder.

"If you please, Sir!" said the small urchin, for the twentieth time, in a voice of weak pleading.

Mr. Merrywhistle looked down, and saw a face that he fancied he had seen before. But the memory of the happy group in Buttercup Square still lingered upon him. What he really saw as he looked down was a little boy without a cap, large-eyed, white-faced, and barefooted. No other than Tom Beadle, in fact, making hay, or trying to make it, not while the sun, but while the moon shone.

"If you please, Sir!" repeated the boy, "will you give me a copper to buy a bit o' bread?"

Then the dawn of faint suspicion loomed upon Mr. Merrywhistle. He placed his hand lightly upon Tom Beadle's shoulder, and said, in a troubled voice, "My boy, haven't I seen you before to-day?"

"No, Sir," boldly answered Tom Beadle, having no suspicion of the truth; for when the shilling was slipped into his hand, his eyes were toward the ground, and he did not see Mr. Merrywhistle's face.

"Were you not on the Royal Exchange with a little girl, and didn't I give you a—a shilling?"

For a moment Tom Beadle winced, and he had it in his mind to twist his shoulder from Mr. Merrywhistle's grasp and run away. For a moment only: natural cunning and his inclination kept him where he was. To tell the honest truth, a lie was a sweet morsel to Tom Beadle, and he absolutely gloried in "taking people in." So, on this occasion, he sent one sharp glance at Mr. Merrywhistle—which, rapid as it was, had all the effect of a sun-picture upon him—and whined piteously, "Me 'ave a shillin' guv to me! Never 'ad sich a bit o' luck in all my born days. It was some other boy, Sir, some cove who didn't want it. They allus gits the luck of it. And as for a little gal and the Royal Igschange, I wish I may die if I've been near the place for a week!"

"And you are hungry?" questioned Mr. Merrywhistle, fighting with his doubts.

"'Aven't 'ad a ounce o' bread in my mouth this blessed day;" and two large tears gathered in Tom Beadle's eyes. He took care that Mr. Merrywhistle should see them.

Mr. Merrywhistle sighed, and with a feeling of positive pain gave twopence to Tom Beadle, who slipped his shoulder from Mr. Merrywhistle's hand with the facility of an eel, and scudded away in an exultant frame of mind.

Mr. Merrywhistle walked a few steps, hesitated, and then turned in the direction that Tom Beadle had taken.

"Now, I wonder," he thought, "whether the collector was right this morning, and whether I have been assisting in making criminals to-day?"

[TO BE CONTINUED IN NO. 52.]

TIM TWINKLETON'S TWINS.

"WELL, ma'am, what is it?" inquired Tim, placing on his plate the crust of bread-and-butter at which his teeth had been nervously nibbling for the past twenty minutes.

"Oh, Sir, it's twins!"

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Tim, overwhelmed with the double blessing that had fallen upon the matrimonial hearth.

Now Mr. Timothy Twinkleton was by trade a journeyman tailor, and as good-hearted a little fellow as the sun shed light upon that Christmas morning. His sympathies were as warm as the irons he used, his temper was as equable as the animals from whose fleecy coats was derived the material upon which he worked, and his heart was as stanch in the cause of friendship as the seams and hems issuing from his nimble fingers. As fitting reward for his kindness and integrity, Tim was blessed with a partner in every way worthy of him, who strove with all her might and main to render his humble abode in Pipeclay Alley, Whitechapel, as pleasant and comfortable as his scant earnings would permit; and very truthful were the remarks constantly made by her neighbors, that Mrs. Twinkleton could do more with half a sovereign than most of those who prnised her economical tact could accomplish with fifteen shillings.

And it was not alone in the judicious spending of her husband's money (for every woman can do that with more or less ease) that Mrs. Twinkleton's virtues as a wife were conspicuous. The cleanliness and neatness of her external appearance were reflected in her home. If you had gone to the cottage of some rural plowman, fresh and sparkling with the honor of having won a prize at one of those curious agricultural associations where they reward particular qualities possessed by certain persons—just as at the Agricultural Hall they distinguish cattle, sheep, pigs, and roots—I defy you to find a home that could exhibit more tidiness, cleanliness, and general coziness than that in which Mr., Mrs., and the little Twinkletons lived, moved, and had their being.

The Twinkletons and the Twinkletons' home not unnaturally became the theme of all the houses round. I say not unnaturally, because while some families could on thirty shillings per week only contrive to occupy the lower of the two floors of which each house in the alley consisted, the Twinkletons managed, with less than that amount—every source of income told—to keep the whole of No. 6. They didn't even let a little back-room to a lodger; no, they kept the entire house. The Twinkletons might, in short, have been regarded as the aristocrats of the district: and how ever Mrs. T. managed it—with such a family too!—was a mystery to every body. What experienced matrons—and there were many such in Pipeclay Alley—could not fathom, can hardly be explained by those living without the charmed circle. Still, it may be safely hazarded that Mrs. Twinkleton's industrious habits and good management had something to do with the matter. Furthermore, it must be known that while Mr. T. made the outer habiliments of mankind, Mrs. T. washed, ironed, and starched the linen which the aforesaid habiliments were in a great measure constructed to conceal. In brief, a neat card in the ground-floor front-room window of the Twinkleton sanctuary conveyed the intelligence to the outside world that Mrs. T. was a washer-woman; while a small painted board, swinging just below the first-floor window, testified in equally lucid terms to the fact that the mysterious operation known as "mangling" was performed inside. Deriving increased zest from the admiring plaudits of their neighbors, Mr. and Mrs. Twinkleton vied with each other in industry. They were never idle—that is, in the common acceptation of the term; for though, of course, they took their family out on holidays, yet their little trips were generally so skillfully contrived that the children derived pleasure and instruction from their excursions, combined with fresh, healthful breezes.

The minds of both Mr. and Mrs. Twinkleton were eminently practical; and so it came about that, prior to these periodical outings, the little ones found that the lessons taught them by father and mother when the day's work was done took rather a peculiar form. For instance, if a visit to the Zoological Gardens was in contemplation, the little Twinkletons would find, about a fortnight before the anticipated visit, that natural history—more especially portions relating to the better-known animals—became particularly prominent in their studies. Now the wisdom of Mr. and Mrs. Twinkleton becomes apparent. It followed, as a natural result, that while the youngsters were gazing open-mouthed and with dilated eyelids at the lions, bears, and tigers, that papa or mamma caused the conversation to assume an interrogative form, and that the children soon found they were expected to answer inquiries that had formed the subject of previous studies. The juvenile recollections were at times confused, and the replies occasionally puzzling; but, on the whole, they always proved satisfactory to Mrs. T., who would reward each successful response with a hearty, sounding kiss that did one good to hear. Mrs. T. was proud of her children; and whether in the privacy of her chamber, or the crowded fashionable haunts of the Zoo on a sixpenny day, or in Victoria Park on a Sunday afternoon, would utter the most glowing prophecies relative to the future of her offspring. It is commonly reported that some other mothers are not lacking in this respect; but Mrs. T. did not mince the matter by merely notifying the fact to her husband: she generally on such occasions proclaimed her utterances just where the crowd was thickest, and at the conclusion of her prophecy would look round defiantly, as though daring any one to dispute her claims to judge of the ability already so conspicuously displayed by the fruit of her union with Mr. Twinkleton. The virtues of Mrs. T., whose personal appearance it is not trespassing the bounds of propriety to describe as short but buxom, were so manifest that those of her husband stood a good chance of being unrecognized, save by those who knew him intimately. Tim unquestionably lacked the fine proportions of his wife; indeed, when he stood in his boots—and they were made with rather high heels too—he could not attain an altitude of more than five feet two inches. But though his appearance was not so striking as that of his wife, yet his heart was quite as big, and he was never tired of trying to inculcate into the minds of his children principles of rectitude, charity, and benevolence that would have done credit to a man of far greater pretension than the happy tenant of 6 Pipeclay Alley.

Reference has been throughout made to the olive-branches which graced the Twinkleton table; but the number thereof remains to be stated. In brief, they amounted, on Christmas-eve, 186–, to exactly double the number of feet enumerated when Mr. Twinkleton's height was in question: that is to say, there were six girls and four boys.

It was the contemplation of these ten little ones, more or less artistically grouped in various parts of the ground-floor front-room, that induced Mr. T. to utter the words, "Good gracious!" when a certain high-priestess entered the apartment at breakfast-time on Christmas morning, and announced the fact that Mrs. T. had just added two more to their happy circle.

His first astonishment over, the little tailor of Pipeclay Alley, when he had gazed upon the most recent pledges of affection with which his wife had presented him, inwardly acknowledged, with thankfulness, that the matter might have been worse. He knew the blessing of triplets was vouchsafed to some men, and he had read occasional dark rumors in the newspapers of four at a birth; but Twinkleton was not of an envious disposition, and speedily reconciled himself to twins only.

It would require the pen of a Macaulay, of a Carlyle, or of some other world-renowned word-painter to describe the emotions that thrilled through the breast of Twinkleton as these fresh manifestations of connubial love were placed before his eyes. Skilled as he was in the handling of infants, it required some judgment to take to his arms the two boys held out to him by the neighbor who acted as nurse. However, he managed to hold them long enough for all his other offspring to bestow a kiss upon their new brothers, and then restored them to the care of the good-natured woman who had so joyfully brought him the intelligence of his domestic increase.

"Would you like to step up to see Mrs. Twinkleton, Sir?" the nurse inquired. "Because, if so, it's perfectly convenient."

Of course Twinkleton, good husband and happy father as he was, started from his chair at once; and bidding the children be good and not make a noise while he was away, bounded from the room and up the stairs ere one could count a dozen.

Mutual congratulations having ensued, and Mrs. Twinkleton having received the assurance from her husband that he had not been disappointed by the appearance of two boys instead of a girl—as female gossips in Pipeclay Alley whispered among themselves had been hoped for—the happy wife began to talk about arrangements in connection with the washing and mangling business of the establishment. Like a prudent woman, Mrs. Twinkleton had, in expectation of the coming event, been very methodical as regards the execution of her work. Still, there was some little matter associated with her employment that now demanded the immediate attention of her husband.

"Let me see, Tim," she said, after a few moments' consideration. "The Smiths had their washing home day before yesterday; and then Jim took back the Browns' last night. There's a collar of Mr. Robinson's got into somebody else's basket, my dear; but I think that must remain until I can come down stairs to see about it. I am afraid, if you have any thing to do with it, the confusion will only be greater."

Twinkleton looked very much as though he was quite of his wife's opinion, and did not enter any protests.

"Whose is that basket of things by the clock?" he asked, when he found that Mrs. T. made no mention thereof.

"Oh, my dear, I'd almost forgotten that! It's the Chelmsford washing," she replied.

"Is it all mangled?"

"Yes; I finished it last night with an effort," sighed Mrs. T. "It's all right, and only wants to be taken to the station."

"If I was to make haste, I dare say I could get it off by the mid day train. There's always one about twelve o'clock on Sundays, and the Christmas-day trains is just like Sundays', ain't they?"

"Well, Tim, if you were to run to the station with it, it 'd be off our hands, without fear of the children tumbling the clothes, wouldn't it?"

Mr. Twinkleton acknowledged that it would, and at once ran down stairs to see how long it wanted to the hour. He was no sooner down, however, than he was up again, with the intimation that it only wanted twenty minutes; so he ought to be off directly. Kissing his wife with much effusion, he hurried from the room, and, in his haste, almost stumbled over the nurse, who was on her way to Mrs. T.'s bedside, and—good ministering angel as she was!—bearing the orthodox basin of gruel before her.

"Where's the twins?" inquired the anxious father, seeing the abigail was free from any incumbrance save the comforting preparation before mentioned.

"Oh, they're all right," the good creature replied. "I've just hushed 'em off, and I've left 'em down stairs, sleeping like tops. Ah, Sir, they're as beautiful babes as ever I set eyes on! And though I've had a good bit of experience in my time—having had a large family myself, as you know—yet I never see two more like their father."

Naturally enough, Mr. T.'s eyes beamed even with greater pleasure than before at hearing such gratifying intelligence from one who was an undoubted authority on such matters, and hastened down the stairs with even greater celerity than previously. On again looking at the clock he found that, if he wanted to catch the mid-day train, he would have to run with his utmost speed. Luckily the washing to be carried to the station did not require any looking at; for had not Mrs. Twinkleton said it was "all right?" and the positive assertion of such a woman did not leave the smallest scope for doubt. The little tailor therefore wound a woolen scarf about his neck—for there was a sharp east wind blowing—and without removing the cloth stretched over the basket of clothes, set off at a good round trot on his way to the station.

In this place it should be recorded that Mrs. Twinkleton's cleanliness, combined with a skill in the matters of clear-starching and mangling that was really marvelous, was the means of bringing to her such a quantity of work that she was, in a measure, enabled to choose her customers. Among those favored by Mrs. T. was the family of a tradesman formerly carrying on business in Shoreditch, but now retired, and resident at Chelmsford. It was somewhat of an inconvenience to get the clothes up to town, and then to send them back a distance of thirty miles; but as the young ladies of the family declared that nobody starched like Mrs. Tim, and almost begged that that estimable woman would still consent to employ her skill on their apparel, the little tailor's wife was virtually compelled to acquiesce in an arrangement that caused her occasionally some extra trouble, but for which she found compensation in charging a fraction more for every article than any other laundress, to her knowledge, ever ventured to do.

With a merry heart, and whistling the chorus of a catching song, Mr. Twinkleton ran through the streets of Whitechapel at a sharp trot, until the heavy pile of building known as Shoreditch Station loomed before him. He had not made a bit too much haste; for as he entered the booking-office the clerk was about to close the doors.

"Now then, where's that washing to go?" inquired the clerk, whose business for the day was over as soon as the Chelmsford train was dispatched, and who was therefore determined that on that occasion the train should not be late in starting.

The official, indeed, hesitated for a moment as to whether punctuality should not for once take the place of courtesy; but his ill humor was quickly dissipated when he saw Twinkleton's rosy face and cheery smile beaming upon him.

"Well, as a special favor, I don't mind booking it," muttered the clerk, who smelled roast goose in the air, and was afraid his own might be overdone if he didn't hasten home.

However, Twinkleton was in such a happy mood that he didn't care whether the clerk made it a special favor or merely a matter of business, so long as the clothes were dispatched; therefore, without being in the least disturbed or humiliated by the other's gruffness, he bade him the customary Christmas salutations, and made his way homeward just as the church folk were issuing from their places of worship.

"Now that little matter's off my mind," observed our hero, in reference to the Chelmsford washing, as the whistle of the departing train rang through the frosty air, almost before he emerged from the yard of the station. "Only just in time, though; but, after making such an effort, I shouldn't have liked Mrs. T. to be disappointed."

Streams of people passed him as he made his way back to his humble dwelling; but he knew well enough that none could be happier than he, and his heart rose in thankfulness to the bounteous Creator, whose care and goodness is exercised over rich and poor alike. On all sides were to be heard the cheery words, "Merry Christmas!" and his joyous spirits responded with a glad "Hear! hear!" He witnessed the meeting of old folks grown gray-headed in friendship, but whose hearts beat with as much warmth as ever; and noted the modest, downcast looks of maidenhood, blushingly replying to the good wishes so plentifully showered around. Every one seemed to have shaken off worldly cares and petty differences, and to meet on one common ground of heartiness and good-fellowship.

Tim was not by nature an observant man, and was able to bestow but scant attention to matters to which many of his fellow-workers in the shop where he was employed devoted no inconsiderable portion of their time. The industrious little tailor didn't care a fig about trades unions or political meetings, but found, with his rapidly increasing family, that if he wished to retain the prestige always belonging to his trim habitation in Pipeclay Alley, he must attend to his business and naught else. Tim had noticed that those who were most strenuous in their advocacy of the rights of labor generally sought their requirements in the cheapest market, and sometimes obtained them at a price which could not possibly compensate those engaged in their manufacture; while he had also thought it strange that occasionally those who, when in a humble capacity, had been the first to complain of arrogance and lack of consideration on the part of their superiors, were, when chance elevated them in position, far more tyrannical and selfish than those whom they had erstwhile calumniated. So long as Tim obtained a fair day's pay for a fair day's work, he did not wish to trouble himself with any doctrines of political economy.

Direct from his labor to his home, the dwellers in Pipeclay Alley knew to a moment when Mr. Twinkleton would make his appearance, and remarked, if a fortune had depended on his punctuality, he could not have been more exact. But though he paid little attention to what took place outside his home, Tim's eyes were not shut to the beneficent influence exercised by the advent of Christmas.

Proud men, whose austerity never relaxed on any other occasion, seemed on the great Christian anniversary to once more think that, like their fellows, they were but units in the mass of mortality, and that a disastrous fire, treacherous wind, or sudden convulsion of the earth might reduce them to the position of the poor acquaintance whom but yesterday they had taken such pains to avoid. The charity-children he met on his road home appeared, as they came from church, to disregard the presence of their masters and mistresses, and passed him, chattering, frolicking, and as full of genial fun as though tasks and exercises were things of the past that could never again affright their youthful understandings. Even the stern beadle, that dread of the juvenile population, unbent himself, and actually condescended to pat cheeringly upon the head one of the more reckless youngsters, who had betaken himself to the slide formed along the gutter that adjoined the paved foot-path.

But though crowds, of all ages and conditions in life, thronged the streets during the half hour that intervened between the close of divine service and the popular dinner hour of one, there was not a person with a lighter heart in his or her bosom than Tim Twinkleton. And, as his joyous spirit told him, he had, indeed, cause for grateful pleasure. Had he not a good wife, loving children, and kind friends? Had he not the coziest home in the whole of the alley? and had not his domestic joys that morning been increased by the appearance of twins? "Ah," the brisk little tailor said to himself, "very few of you have had such a Christmas present as that." This pleasant thought was considered such an admirable stroke of witticism that Tim couldn't help bursting into a loud laugh in the open street; indeed, he presented such a strange appearance that the policeman who happened to be passing at the time imagined for a moment that the hospitalities of the season had been too freely enjoyed by Mr. Twinkleton.

He had been so much engaged with his reflections upon happiness in general, and his own good humor in particular, that it was nearly one o'clock ere he arrived at the entrance of the alley. There his olfactory senses were regaled with an odor that was not altogether unpleasant, but was at least peculiar. At one step there was a strong scent of boiled onions; at the next there was a smell as of a large wash, probably arising from the steam occasioned by the boiling of a monster pudding. He put his right leg foremost, and a distinct savor of roasting goose filled the air; he brought his left leg into position, and, lo! the gentle breezes of Pipeclay Alley wafted to his senses an odor that Tim thought might be produced by baked pork and potatoes. The fragrant emanations that greeted his nostrils naturally brought him to the subject of dinner, and it was not without some misgiving that he entered his house.

It was the rule as well as fashion among Mr. Twinkleton's neighbors to belong to a club held at an adjacent hostelry, where, by the payment of sixpence per week for a specified time prior to Christmas, a very large goose and a bottle of superexcellent gin were guaranteed on the eve of the great anniversary. In such a prudent course of proceeding it is needless to say Mr. Twinkleton was not behind his fellows; therefore it was with much jubilation on the part of the family—and more especially the younger branches thereof—that a fine fat bird had been the night before suspended in the back kitchen, which in Mr. Twinkleton's humble establishment had to serve as wash-house, pantry, and scullery.

It had been the intention to keep up the charter of previous Christmas-days by roasting this magnificent goose for dinner, but by some curious gift of prophecy Mrs. Twinkleton, while she was preparing the Chelmsford washing overnight, had had a presentiment (though she kept it to herself) that for once the pleasant annual custom would be suffered to lapse. The good lady who was acting as nurse unfortunately did not add to her virtues the art of cooking: now Twinkleton knew this, and that probably, as a consequence, his wife would insist upon the goose "hanging" for a few days, until she was able to give the directions necessary for the preparation of such an important dinner. It was, therefore, with misgiving as to what had really been provided for him that he scraped his boots outside the door and inserted the key in the lock.

He had, however, suffered undue apprehension; for though the excellent Mrs. T. had countermanded the goose, she had caused some steak to be sent for, and this being cooked and placed upon the table, with a huge pile of potatoes, sent forth such a fragrant steam that it seemed to impregnate the atmosphere of the apartment in no time, and made the juvenile Twinkletons rush for their chairs, and seat themselves round the festive board almost ere their joyous parent had taken off the woolen comforter that had encompassed his neck.

"Mrs. T. getting on all right?" was naturally the little tailor's first inquiry of the nurse, who was quietly informing the children that there was a pudding in prospective.

"Getting on capitally, Mr. T.; but she's asleep now; so you had better not go up to see her," was the response.

"Oh, certainly not; and how's the twins?"

"They haven't cried since you've been away."

"Dear me!" said Mr. Twinkleton, speaking amidst a perfect din of knives and forks; for the assembled children had had their senses sharpened by the anticipation of the pudding, and thought the proper thing to do was to get rid of the steak and potatoes as speedily as possible. "They seem to be very quiet, good children, Mrs. Tomkins."

"Perfect little angels, Sir, I think," said the good woman, casting a radiant smile upon the parent of the blessings referred to.

Mr. Twinkleton contented himself with the reply that if they were only as good as the other children were he should be perfectly satisfied; at which the ten assembled young Twinkletons smiled benignantly, first at each other, and then at their papa, and at once began to surreptitiously deliver sundry and promiscuous kicks beneath the table.

"A capital bit of steak, and admirably cooked, Mrs. Tomkins," said Mr. Twinkleton, helping himself to what remained upon the dish; while his family eagerly watched him, and with rapture bethought themselves that every bit he consumed brought the pudding nearer to them. "I suppose, Mrs. Tomkins," continued Mr. Twinkleton, thoroughly unaware of how greatly, in the estimation of the children, he was wasting valuable time—"I suppose it wouldn't do to give the twins a little bit, would it, ma'am?"

Mrs. Tomkins smirked, and raised her hands in protest at the bare idea of such a thing; but Mr. Twinkleton hadn't done with his joke yet, and resumed, much to the annoyance of the children, who were now getting thoroughly impatient,

"Not even a little of the gravy wouldn't do for 'em, eh, Mrs. Tomkins?"

The worthy Mrs. Tomkins at this point could contain herself no longer, but, indulging in a fit of laughter, bid Mr. Twinkleton "go along" (whatever that might mean).

"Why, Sir," she exclaimed, "do they look, dear little things, as if they could enjoy a bit of steak? No! dada must wait a bit for that, mustn't he, my preciouses?"

The latter part of this sentence was addressed to the unconscious twins; and while uttering it Mrs. Tomkins turned in her chair, as though expecting the mute darlings to make some sign of thoroughly coinciding with her, and offering a silent protest to the invitation of their papa. Not seeing her "preciouses" (the word had been coined into the plural number by Mrs. Tomkins, in order to meet the exigences of the occasion), she rose to her feet and went into the next room. She quickly returned, and, speaking to the children collectively, inquired,

"Which of you has moved the basket with the twins?"

Almost ere the words had quitted her lips, Tim dropped his knife and fork, and gazed from Mrs. Tomkins to the children, and from the children to Mrs. Tomkins, with an expression of countenance that made the nurse rush to his side and say,

"Bless me, Mr. Twinkleton! you aren't ill, are you?"

"Basket! what basket?" gasped Tim.

"Why, the clothes basket that stood there by the clock. I put 'em there because they fell asleep, and it being close by the fire, I knew they'd be all right."

A loud groan escaped Twinkleton's lips. Then, with his face of an ashy paleness, he gasped,

"Unhappy woman! that basket contained the Chelmsford washing, and it's gone off by the mid-day train!"

Mrs. Tomkins, without a word, sank into a chair.

"What—what's to be done?" groaned Twinkleton. "Why don't you speak, Mrs. Tomkins? Tell me, somebody, what's to be done?"

The children, open-mouthed, gazed with surprise upon their elders; but in answer to their parent's inquiry as to what was to be done, it was on the lips of at least seven out of the ten, that perhaps the best thing to be done, under the circumstances, was to take up the pudding.

"Can't—can't you telegraph?" suggested the grief-stricken Tomkins.

"Telegraph, ma'am! they can't send the twins back on the top of the wire."

The unhappy Tomkins groaned aloud; then, swaying herself backward and forward in the rocking-chair, began to weep copiously.

Disappointment at the non-appearance of the pudding, surprise at the rapid change in their father's spirits, and, above all, the most overwhelming sympathy with that Niobe, Mrs. Tomkins, struck a chord in the hearts of the children, and with one consent they burst into a blubber, which, being uttered in various keys, according to the age of the juveniles, had an effect neither harmonious to the ear nor pleasing to the eye. The bereaved father was the first to speak.

"Come, come," he said, "this won't do. I must go to the station, and see if there's another train. If there ain't, I must hire a trap, and go to Chelmsford. Perhaps, however, when I get there, the children will have been smothered; or suppose, Mrs. Tomkins, if they've shoved the clothes in a luggage van, and a heavy box or something's been put a-top of 'em, why, they'll be squashed to pancakes!"

"Oh! don't, don't, DON'T talk like that, Mr. Twinkleton!" roared Mrs. Tomkins, in a paroxysm of emotion. "Oh, my darling little preciouses!"

"Well, ma'am," exclaimed our hero, placing his right foot in the middle of the centre rose of the hearth-rug, and looking like a knight of the medieval age ready to do battle for his lady-love, "I think it would be more correct to describe them as my preciouses. You were so confoundedly careful of them that you must needs cover them over with the oil-cloth, as though the basket held nothing but the washing. Of course I didn't look to see what there was underneath."

"Oh, Twinkleton, Twinkleton!" gasped Mrs. Tomkins, removing from her eyes the print apron that she was using to stanch the visible effect of her emotion, "I did not expect reproaches from you, after preparing the dinner too! Why, 'twas because I might be able to have time to cook the steak nicely that I obeyed Mrs. Twinkleton's wish, and hushed the twins off to sleep. Oh, Twinkleton, this is indeed cruel!"

The poor lady could get no farther; a flood of tears welled to her eyes, and she could say no more.

"Mrs. Tomkins, ma'am, I beg your pardon," responded the almost distraught Twinkleton. "I will go out and see if I can hear any thing of the twins; and in the mean time perhaps 'twould be as well if nothing was said about it to Mrs. Twinkleton."

"Ah, now, Sir, you speak like the good father and husband I always thought you," replied Mrs. Tomkins, once more making an attempt to dry her eyes. Then, seeing Twinkleton energetically buttoning his coat around him, preparatory to facing once more the gusty east wind, a horrible suspicion seemed to flash across her mind, and springing to her feet, she seized his arm, and gasped, "Oh, Twinkleton, Twinkleton, if you don't find the twins, you won't commit suicide, will you? Remember the good creature up stairs, and those dear treasures around you."

The dear treasures referred to, finding attention so suddenly directed to them, began to blubber with tenfold energy.

"Mrs. Tomkins," responded Tim, impressively, and with the air of some Christian martyr going to a place of torture, "I hope I know my duty to my wife and children. With regard to the twins, ma'am, we must hope for the best."

Having delivered himself of these majestic observations, Tim, again with the air of a very injured person indeed, withdrew Mrs. Tomkins's grasp from his arm, and strode into the street.

How deserted the main thoroughfare seemed!—scarcely any one but an occasional policeman to be seen; and even the looks of the trusty guardian of the peace appeared to inspire the expectation that if he were asked to withdraw himself from his patrol, and take part in some festive gathering, he would, despite official decrees to a contrary effect, have been exceedingly glad to accept the proffered invitation. But though the passers-by were few, quiet did not reign in the streets through which Twinkleton ran on his way to the station, inasmuch as sounds of laughter proceeded from the houses, and occasionally some merry bacchanalian ditty would ring through the frosty air, and fall like a heavy weight upon the depressed spirits of the unhappy Twinkleton.

"Who knows?" he thought: "perhaps when the railway officials learn my distress, they'll have a train put on special, and I shall be able to rescue the twins before any harm comes to 'em."

Scarcely had the thought sent joy and hopeful expectation throughout his soul than there came another reflection—a sober sensible one, which his mind convinced him was more reasonable than that in which he had just indulged. Even if the railway officials granted a special train, who would forsake their Christmas enjoyments to plunge through the cold atmosphere for thirty miles and back again with the sole object of restoring to the bosom of their family Twinkleton's twins? Who was Twinkleton? and what business had a poor little tailor with twins? The unfortunate Tim knew well the heartlessness of the outer world, and rightly guessed that such would be the observations of many when they came to a knowledge of his mishap. Then suppose the twins should die of starvation on the road, even if they escaped the dangers of the luggage, would he, Tim Twinkleton, be brought before the magistrate on a charge of manslaughter, or perhaps murder? Here was another terrible thought. Was the good name of himself and wife to be dragged through the slough of a police court? Each of his imaginings was more horrible than the last, and seemed to give fresh impetus to his heels; for instead of decreasing in pace as he approached the railway station, his footsteps grew more rapid.

"That's the man; I'd swear to him," said a loud voice in Twinkleton's ear.

Involuntarily he turned, and ere his scattered senses recalled a knowledge of who had spoken, a sturdy constable had seized him securely by the collar, and, drawing his staff, had whispered to the startled Tim that if he didn't go quietly to the station, "it 'd be the worse for him."

"That's the man; he came in just as I was closing the doors, and wished particularly to have the basket booked by that train."

"Oh, you're the clerk at the station!" cried Tim, joyously, recognizing the surly tones of the man who had been in a hurry to get home to his dinner, and, owing to the Chelmsford clothes-basket, hadn't succeeded yet in accomplishing his wish. "And the twins—are they all right?"

The tall policeman gave the hand that grasped Tim's collar such a peculiar twist that the poor little tailor was nearly whirled off his feet.

"I caution you not to speak; cos what you say may be taken down in evidence agin yer."

"Oh, you wretch! and they were twins too, he said!"

These words were evidently spoken by a female voice; and turning his head as far round as the constable's knuckles would allow, Tim was astounded to see that a numerous but not select party of hooting boys and dirty men and women were following him with menacing gestures. "What's the charge?" inquired Tim, in a husky voice.

"Oh, you know well enough, I dessay; why, abandoning o' hinfants, in course; and a good job for you it's no worse," replied his custodian.

Tim inwardly thanked the rough policeman for his intelligence. The mention of the charge convinced him that, whatever misfortunes might have occurred to his progeny, they were at least alive; so, without another word, he accompanied the constable and railway clerk to the station-house.

The crowd that had hitherto followed in his rear judiciously thought they were safer from the recognition of anxious acquaintances belonging to the police force in remaining outside the building than they would have been had they entered the inspector's room; therefore Tim had the satisfaction of discovering that only the railway clerk, the policeman, and himself entered the station-house. Still farther gratified was the prisoner Twinkleton to find that the Chelmsford washing-basket, with the twins smiling pleasantly therein, had preceded his arrival; and furthermore, as though in additional requital for what he had gone through, he saw talking to the inspector on duty an old customer of his employer's, who always specially praised Tim's workmanship, and insisted upon being measured for his clothing by Twinkleton alone. It afterward transpired that the old gentleman was a friend of the inspector's, and had just casually dropped in to give him a Christmas greeting when the prisoner Twinkleton was brought in. But for the presence of the old gentleman poor Tim might have had to spend his Christmas-day within the walls of the station-house. Fortune, however, befriended him; and the shrewd intelligence of the inspector, aided by that of Tim's acquaintance, soon grasped the real facts of the case. The railway clerk's statement was to the effect that the prisoner had been terribly anxious to get rid of his basket, and that it was only immediately prior to its being tossed into the luggage-van of the train that the twins gave token of their presence. Search was at once made for Tim, but his haste to get back to the bosom of his family rendered any endeavor to discover him in the precincts of the station perfectly useless. Then it was that the twins were given into the care of a constable, and the quick official zeal of that functionary at once saw that the prisoner had made an attempt to abandon his offspring. Tim's explanation of these matters was so satisfactory that his friend, the old gentleman, was willing to be bail for him to any amount; and after half an hour's conversation, the affair ended by Tim's being allowed to march off in triumph, bearing both the Chelmsford washing and the twins with him. His old friend, in order to recognize the efficiency of the police force, insisted on handing the constable a gratuity of five shillings; and, as compensation for missing the hour at which he had appointed to dine, an equal sum was tendered to, and accepted by, the railway clerk. Nor did the gentleman's generosity end here; for, seeing Tim striding down the street, with both hands clasping his precious burden, and with a considerable sprinkling of the crowd that had accompanied him to the station jeering in his rear, he insisted on making the little tailor enter a cab. Paying the driver with a liberality that caused the Jehu to respectfully touch his hat, the old gentleman bid him drive Tim and the twins as rapidly as he could to Pipeclay Alley; and then, wishing Mr. Twinkleton a merry Christmas, and promising him a private order to be executed when Tim liked, the old gentleman turned away as light-hearted and merry as though only eighteen instead of sixty winters had passed over his head. Under these favorable conditions, it was not long ere Tim found himself once more face to face with Mrs. Tomkins and his little ones.

Of course Twinkleton's first inquiry was for his wife, and a load seemed lifted off his heart when he heard that she was still asleep, and therefore unconscious of what had happened to her offspring. The worthy nurse, when she saw the twins had not suffered from the checkered events of the day, gave vent to a flood of tears that seemed to relieve her feelings immensely. Then, of course, the children had a few tears to shed; but at last the sunshine of happiness spread itself over the little room, and it was wonderful how every body cheered up when an intimation was given by Mrs. Tomkins that probably 'twould be as well to have in the pudding.

Owing to the grief occasioned by the loss of their newly born brothers, the children had not as yet seen any thing of the Christmas delicacy provided for them by the indefatigable Mrs. Tomkins, but, as that lady remarked, "a plum-pudding's one of those things which can't be boiled too much;" and so at last the youthful members of the Twinkleton family were allowed to satisfy their appetites. Then came such a clatter of knives, spoons, and forks for the space of ten minutes as has been rarely heard, while Tim looked on with the utmost contentment and gladness. When they had finished their meal, the happy father made his little ones form a circle around him, and narrated such wonderful stories relative to the manner in which certain beneficent fairies befriended obedient and dutiful children that each juvenile Twinkleton retired to bed with a full resolution to prove worthy of the patronage of the whole elfin tribe.

The twins have now become fine, healthy, roguish lads; and though they display a wonderful capacity for street games and all out-door amusements—perhaps occasioned by their experiences of the first day of their existence—Tim Twinkleton and his wife have never had cause for regret that the twins' presence in the basket became known to the railway officials ere they were thrown into the luggage-van en route for Chelmsford.

☞ THE Publishers take pleasure in announcing that they have secured for the new Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR the most brilliant and fascinating array of literary and artistic attractions ever offered simultaneously to the American public. They comprise, for immediate issue, besides others that will be in due time announced in these columns, the following works:

"MIDDLEMARCH," a new serial story by GEORGE ELIOT, to commence in HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 16.

"MISS OR MRS.?" by WILKIE COLLINS, illustrated with striking full-page engravings from original drawings, to commence December 23.

"BLADE-O'-GRASS," by B. L. FARJEON, author of "Joshua Marvel," with many beautiful illustrations, is commenced in the present Supplement of HARPER'S BAZAR.

"THE GOLDEN LION OF GRANPERE," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, with illustrations, to commence in the February number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

They have also secured the plates and advance sheets of "LONDON: A PILGRIMAGE," by GUSTAVE DORÉ and BLANCHARD JERROLD, a new and magnificent series of illustrations from the pencil of the great French artist.

A new Novel by Miss THACKERAY, whose writings have won deserved popularity by their purity of tone, genial imagination, and fascinating style, will be commenced early in the year.

The great Spanish statesman, EMILIO CASTELAR, will furnish an important and interesting paper for an early number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE on "Republicanism in Europe."

These unprecedented attractions will require occasional literary Supplements to HARPER'S BAZAR and HARPER'S WEEKLY, which will be included in the regular issue, free of charge to subscribers.

We congratulate the readers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR on the rich and tempting intellectual repast provided for their enjoyment, and upon the rare privilege of sitting down to their monthly or weekly feast of fancy and flow of soul with such a select and excellent company of entertainers as GEORGE ELIOT, WILKIE COLLINS, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, CHARLES LEVER, Professor DE MILLE, B. L. FARJEON, GUSTAVE DORÉ, Miss MULOCK, Miss BRADDON, GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, M. D. CONWAY, PORTE CRAYON, BAYARD TAYLOR, R. H. STODDARD, JOHN HAY, HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, EUGENE LAWRENCE, Dr. I. I. HAYES, THOMAS NAST, SOL EYTINGE, Jun., CHARLES PARSONS, W. L. SHEPPARD, JULES TAVERNER, and many others of high rank in the world of letters and art. In securing this unprecedented array of splendid names, the Publishers are only carrying out their original design, and fulfilling what they conceive to be the legitimate duty of the conductors of widely circulated and popular periodicals. They intend that wherever their periodicals circulate they shall exert a healthful influence in every department of literature and art; and that in the future, as in the past, they shall be not only unsurpassed but unapproachable in the sphere of illustrated journalism.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR meet and satisfy the intellectual wants of the great mass of intelligent American readers; and in treating of literary, political, social, or domestic themes, offer an amount of wholesome instruction, recreation, and amusement which will be sought elsewhere in vain. They represent, therefore, for every American household the Graphic Literature of the World.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Embroidered Smoking-Cap.

THIS cap is made of brown gros grain, bound with brown silk cord, thinly wadded and quilted, with a lining of brown silk. For the crown of the cap cut a circular piece eight inches and a half in diameter, and for the rim cut a straight piece of the requisite length and three inches and a half wide. Cut the revers from Fig. 70, Supplement.

Footstool with Oriental Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THE cover of this pretty footstool is set together of pieces of cloth of different colors ornamented in Oriental embroidery. The octagonal cover, which is made of curled hair and gray linen, is slightly rounded on the upper side, and is covered on the bottom with black carriage leather. For the upper cover cut, first, a piece of black cloth of a suitable size, and on this transfer the design given on Fig. 32, Supplement, which has previously been completed, cut separate pieces of red and blue cloth as indicated on Fig. 32, Supplement, and paste these first on tissue-paper and then on the piece of black cloth with gum-arabic. Work the chain stitch embroidery, as shown by illustration Fig. 2, with silk in different colors; where the colored pieces of cloth come together, as well as along their outer edges, sew corn-colored silk braid with a cross seam of black saddler's silk, as shown by illustration Fig. 1. Trim the cushion with variegated twisted worsted fringe, and cover the seam made by doing this with a row of coarse woolen cord of similar colors. The colors, of course, can be varied to suit the taste, and other patterns may be used, a number of which have been given in former Supplements. But for Persian or Turkish embroidery, bright colors in arabesque patterns must always be employed on a dark ground.

GREAT-HEARTEDNESS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IF there is a clumsy word inside or outside the dictionaries, it is this. If I could invent, transfer, or pilfer a better one, I would do so without hesitation; but where is the coveted word? I am not thinking of grandeur of mind, breadth of intellect, though possibly a degree of mental breadth is indispensable to moral magnanimity. I do not mean the quality which inspires to royal largess, or which produces heroes in great emergencies, but those far more important qualities which make people comfortable and delightful to live with.

Not, indeed, that the qualities which make people comfortable companions are always magnanimous. A good degree of self-esteem may work marvels of daily repose. It confers upon its possessor an unfailing content, and does no one else any harm. The man thinks so well of himself that he never suspects other people to be thinking ill of him. He assumes, unconsciously no doubt, that his wife, his children, his house, and equipage are every thing that they ought to be, and he is never suspicious or uneasy. He is not quick to imagine slights. You do not feel obliged to keep a sharp look-out lest his self-love take offense. His self-love is panoplied in triple oak, and, to the outside world, answers every purpose of amiability. In a crisis, to be sure, you may run against it, and find that it is a smiling and supreme selfishness, indurated and invincible; but you may go on for years and never find it out, because you never do run against it.

But magnanimity of character is a real thing. It not only never fails you at the critical moment, but it prevents moments from becoming critical. It is not only sublime in the great historical crises of life, but it makes the routine of every day rich and sweet and interesting. It is the opposite of pettiness, pettishness, childishness. It has a wide vision and sees the relations of things, and does not magnify mole-hills to mountains.

We read stories of conjugal disturbances, domestic tiffs, rising, perhaps, at first, from unconsidered trifles, but increasing and souring into sulks, and days and weeks and months of alienation. The husband is somewhat wrong, and the wife is somewhat wrong, but neither will confess or forsake his sin; and so they go on till the situation becomes embarrassing, though all the while they are really very fond of each other in the depths of their hearts, and are longing for reconciliation. The frame-work of the story is the roundabout methods of fire, flood, or fever which bring them back to peace and harmony.

To me, I confess, such actions seem altogether childish, and the advice fit for the actors is that they go back into knickerbockers and short dresses until they can behave like men and women. In the stress and strain of domestic life there will sometimes be sharp words from the sweetest lips—words that spring solely from nervous excitement or fatigue, words that have no root of bitterness, though they are any thing but soothing at the time. But the idea of treasuring up these words, carrying them around in your memory, rolling them as a sweet morsel under your tongue, and hurling them back at your friend when the irritation has long passed away, and the offense is actually forgotten! For it is true that people do forget. A man in a transient, nervous fever will say a bitter thing, which is so thoroughly superficial that in an hour he will really have forgotten that he said it. He not only meant nothing by it, but he had nothing to mean, and does not remember any call to use the offending words. Here is where magnanimity of character shows itself to excellent advantage. A woman who has no perception of relations, who gives to the expression of a fleeting annoyance all the force of a rooted and grounded discontent, who magnifies the forgetfulness of preoccupation into an intentional or habitual slight, may be an excellent housewife, a loyal and truthful woman, but she is a very uncomfortable companion. Indifference and selfishness are never to be condoned; they are not to be forgiven without repentance, nor forgotten without reformation. I am speaking now only of manifestations which the freedom generated of long intimacy will permit in the best of husbands and wives. A magnanimous woman takes these things for what they are worth. She does not, perhaps, pass them over entirely unnoticed, but she does not ponder them in her heart. If her husband steps into the carriage before her, leaving her to climb in as she may, because he is a brutal boor, she divorces him at once. It is the only proper thing to do. But if he commits the impropriety in a fit of abstraction, she may browbeat him to her heart's content, but she does it merrily, "as if she loved him." His lapses from courtesy provoke only a good-humored raillery, and grow small by degrees and beautifully less. They lend a piquancy to the tea-table, give a pleasant stir to the surface of life, but reach nothing in the depths. The love is too deep and real and strong to be so much as touched by that which, indeed, has nothing to do with love.

If you have got to be careful with your friends, it is not worth while to have any. When you must weigh your words, and speak advisedly lest you give offense, or be misunderstood, let the curtain fall. Perfect friendship is perfect freedom. Freedom to be dull and cross and captious and rude, then? Yes, if it is right to be cross and captious and rude. Whatever it is right to be, it is right to be toward your friend. If it is dignified for a man and a brother to be savage and moody, don't put a restraint upon yourself on account of your wife, dear man and brother. If it is worthy and womanly to be irritable and exacting, and to mark iniquity, or to mark abstraction as iniquity, why should a woman repress her development on account of her husband? I say that it is better to be large-natured and sunny and sweet, if you are the only living being in the whole world; and if there are two of you, and you live together, it is indispensable. Two people in association can be perfectly happy only when they have to repress and crush that alone which is of itself undesirable and unlovely, and can give full scope to whatever is lovely, or innocent, or restful. The good of having a friend is that you can be silly and stupid, and he likes you all the same. To your outside acquaintances you must be as animated and sensible as possible, or they will think you are not glad to see them; but when a man goes home after a day of annoyances and fatigue, his wife knows he is glad to see her, though he lie on the sofa and speak not ten words the whole evening. That is, if he is the right sort of husband, and does it in the right sort of way. He may be grewsome and gruff, and she does not know what to make of him, and lets him alone; but if he is what he ought to be, if he have the sense and the heart to speak the right word, and walk in the natural way of a great-hearted man, she is just as good to him as if he were brilliantly entertaining; she makes a baby of him for the nonce, and turns his home into a paradise of rest and peace. And if she is wearied and fretted, if she spoke petulantly a while ago, and is ready to cry at nothing, is he to lay it up against her? Is he, a great strong man, all muscle and nerve and breezy health—is he coming home from the brisk, bracing outer world to be sullen and silent, to remember her hasty speech, and wait for her to make the first overture of reconciliation? Not he. He has magnanimity of character in little things. He would scorn such mean feelings, such malignant hoarding. He tramples all pettiness under his feet. He remembers nothing, or remembers it only to be a little more tender and outspoken; and crams her sewing into her basket, and jams her hat on her head, back side before most likely, and forces her out to drive against all her protests that she can't go, she has so much to do, which he serenely shows her is false, because here she is already on the road; and so they come home as happy and blithe as birds, all freshly fortified against the wear and tear of life. Reconciliation, indeed! A man—a man—ought to be doubly and trebly ashamed of ever laying up any thing against his wife. No matter if she is at fault, he has no business to remember it. He ought to brush it all away with his manly, muscular vigor, and his hearty, uncalculating love, and be to her always a source as well as a centre of sunshine. That is the way to make home happy. That is the way to make good wives and mothers. It will not take a very long course of this treatment to produce such a healthiness and robustness of love as shall stand all possible shocks and understand all developments of liberty. Rooted and grounded in such love, they may both be tired together without hurting each other, and that is about the hardest strain to which human nature can be subjected by any but the heroic tests.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of a Song.

MY DEAR CARLO,—I was sitting in my room toward sunset of one of these beautiful autumn days, the windows open, yet with a little fire in the grate, when I heard the sound of a harp and violin, and a clear, shrill boy's voice began to sing an Italian song. What is the spell of music? I sat enchanted and motionless. I was no longer your grave ancient friend with the thin gray hair, but a bounding youth full of life and enthusiasm, sitting in a Neapolitan balcony in the May moonlight, looking across the gleaming water to the faint glow about the crater of Vesuvius, and listening to the sweet, sad singing of the lazy loiterers below. Or I was the same youth skimming the Venetian lagunes at sunset, home-returning from the Lido, and murmuring,

> "In Venice Tasso's echoes are no more,
> And silent rows the songless gondolier;"

but suddenly arrested, as strains of singing as tenderly sweet as Venice ever heard floated over the water in the perfect calm. Or, once more, I was the same youth in Rome, hearing the pifferari play before the Madonna shrines at the street corner on Christmas morning; or sitting on an April afternoon at a locanda on the Campagna drinking Velletri with the other happy youth, while the wine-carts rumbled by, and the driver droned his solitary Campagna song.

Such was the magic of the boy with the clear, shrill voice under my window. But in making me the youth I describe, the boy showed me that I am all that I have ever been. The memories of that youth looking at Vesuvius, or floating upon the sunset lagunes, or drinking the wine upon the Campagna, are not his: they are mine. That youth knows nothing now of those dear past delights; but I do. That youth you would not find if you searched Italy from the Apennines to Tarentum. But all he had I have, and all that he enjoyed I enjoy. Sic vos non vobis, as we used to say in our Latin days: thus you live not for yourself, O youth loitering in Italy, or wherever the good genius of happy travel leads. You live for him who shall follow you—your heir; him whom one day you shall be. You lay up treasures of romance and memory; but, generous youth, it is not you with beating heart and soul fresh with hope; not you with lithe form and elastic step, cheerily climbing the Alps and lingering along the lovely shore of Como; not you with the light of morning in your eyes: but some sober gray-beard whom you can not see nor imagine; some patriarch, respectable, bent-backed, and thin-haired, who will possess your treasures and enjoy them. And if he be indeed yourself, how shall you know it? How but by feeling, as I felt when the boy sang shrill under my window, that the heart of that youth of old beats unchanged in my breast, and that the picture of the Naples and the Venice and the Rome he saw hangs undimmed in the gallery of my memory?

Yet if the heir of that youth should return to seek him in his haunts of travel and delight, would he find him? If I should sail across the sea, and sit in that balcony in the May moonlight, and look over the gleaming bay at the glowing crest of Vesuvius, or float in that Venetian sunset, or quaff Velletri upon the Campagna, should I feel the old enthusiasm, the old flush and spring of hope? The youth whose image the boy's song recalled stood at the threshold, but the heir has gone beyond. That group of friends of whom the youth was one, who stood one summer evening upon the sands of the Lido, and saw the full moon rise from the Adriatic, looked into the future as into that twilight over the sea, and their dreams and hopes were as full and perfect as that moon, and filled that future with as golden splendor. If now once more they stood together by that evening sea, even with the freshness of their hearts untouched, and the glow of hope unquenched, yet would not experience have taught them the probable limits of attainment, so that one would not secretly feel that his wondrous hand of art would surpass that of Raphael and of Giorgione, nor another that the great singers of all time would welcome him to their side, nor a third that he should yet "mould a state's decrees?"

No: that youth can not be found. Days as beautiful and scenes as fair as he knew may still be known, but his day of days will never dawn again. Aprils and Mays as bright and warm may come with every year of a thousand, but not the very April and the very May he knew. Heart and hope are unchanged, but time—time "steals from its figure, and no pace perceived." So seemed the boy to sing. His shrill voice was the enchanting spell. His song was the sponge passed over the picture, and lo! every tint was as fresh and even softer than when it was laid on. He passed from one song to another, but they were all Italian, and all seemed to be the same song. All the years since the youth floated on the lagunes, and all their wonderful history, and all his own life and experience, disappeared, and there was no day later than that April day upon the Campagna: so that I, dear Carlo, your ancient friend, in hearing that song, was like Christian when his burden dropped at the gate, for so the burden of years dropped from me, and I was young.

When the boy stopped singing I did not wait, but went to the window and spoke to him. A pair of dark Italian eyes looked up at me from the dirty face of a ragged little boy. He took off his cap and held it as if to catch something. I dropped some money into it and said, "Grazia, piccolino!" There was a look of surprise in the dark eyes, and a sweet "Buon giorno, signore!" as I turned away. There was no possible relation of value between what he had given me and what I had given him; and when I heard some one contemptuously say the next day that something was not worth a song, I smiled to think how invaluable a song might be. Yet it is not necessary that all songs should be actually sung to produce the best effect of singing. I asked what is the magic of music, but I do not expect any answer. Perhaps it is that of association. Perhaps the sadness which it inspires—a sadness independent of its immediate purpose or apparent character—is because it vaguely recalls a prior purity that we have forgotten. Richter said that music spoke to him of what he knew not, and could never know. Was it the hint of a former life forgotten, or the prophecy of a life too lovely for human conditions? What is the pathos of a waltz? Is it merely the measure—the triple beat? But why is that melancholy? Is it the old mystery of the number three?

How often have I stood in a ball-room, brilliant with lights and full of fragrant flowers, and watched beautiful girls moving airily in the waltz! There was the hum of conversation and of pleasant laughter, and trouble and care were apparently wholly excluded. It was a feast of youth and beauty and love. But as I marked the gliding forms, the music to which they moved was profoundly melancholy. Was it a wail over the evanescence of that very youth, over the sure withering of that beauty? In every ball-room I seem to hear in the music Weber's exquisite "Invitation to the Waltz." He, too, had felt the pathos of the scene, and has marvelously reproduced it. But I said that the song need not always be sung. You may recognize it by its influence. I have heard many an orator whose presence and manner and tones of voice were so magnetic that, without hearing a word he said, I have been profoundly touched and impressed. All my good purposes were refreshed, all my mean compliances became contemptible. It was easier, after hearing him, to do what I knew that I ought to do. I was lifted out of the mean ruts of life, and the beauty of high and honorable living was again revealed. I sat enchanted under the spell of the voice as under that of the Italian boy's song. The effect was that of music.

I remember, also, Lucia, whom we shall see no more. She was born of poor parents, and all the details of the life around her were harassing and mean. Her mother was overworked, her father moody and silent. There were many children—it might have been Maud Muller's household—and she the oldest child. Christian bore no heavier burden, nor did he bear it more gayly. With steady good humor and unflinching resolution Lucia did the endless duty that fell to her. Parental scolding and snarling and injustice she bore with smiling patience. She soothed the woes of the little folks, and lightened as she could the labors of those from whom no thanks came. Her life seemed to be a mere dwindling perspective of hard struggling with poverty and want of sympathy; but if it had appeared to be the shining ladder of the vision, with angels descending and ascending into heaven, it would not have been more cheerfully regarded. There was nobody to praise her, nobody to whisper of a better time coming. Indeed, no better time came. When I knew her, it was very slightly, for I was much older than she, and she could not make me a companion. But as I saw her life, it was as when the boy's song floated up to my window. Her heroic fidelity, her smiling, unconscious devotion to duty, restored the visions of youth, in which all that is most noble seems to be most natural, and all that is most generous most practicable. She died long ago; and it was of one who not only resembled her in name that Wordsworth sang:

"She lived unknown, and few could know
When Lucy ceased to be:
But she is in her grave, and oh!
The difference to me."

So, dear Carlo, as I sat in my room and heard the song of the Italian boy, it brought back to me the feelings, the hopes, the aims of the youth who lived a happy year in Italy, and so stimulated and purified the life of the old gentleman, his heir, who has the honor of addressing you. And even so, whatever in character or influence of any kind appeals by some subtile association to the high faith and unworn resolve that characterize youth, seems to me like the singing of the boy under my window. And therefore it was that when a great officer of state unconsciously showed me by constant example that meanness and selfishness and intrigue were not essential to the highest position, I told him that if he would hold up his hat I would drop ten cents into it, and wish him buon giorno. Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

OPERA AND BALL TOILETTES.

WHITE TULLE.

THE gayeties attendant on the visit of the Grand Duke Alexis brought out some notable opera and ball toilettes. Loveliest among these were pure white dresses of diaphanous tulle, brightened by folds of lustrous satin. Flat trimmings, such as row after row of side pleatings, trim the trained skirts; the upper skirts are doubled tulle, ingeniously folded to conceal any defined edge, and draped by sprays and garlands of flowers; the low corsage has flower garniture, and sometimes rare old lace, such as the gossamer Malines, ornaments it. Such a dress was worn at the Academy ball by the Marquise de S. Marzano et Coraglio, formerly Miss Gillender. It consisted, first, of a trained taffeta skirt, with a flounce of stiff pleatings to support the skirt proper. Over this is the Lyons tulle skirt, bordered with a wide ruche of tulle, and clusters of triple puffs drooping to overlap like ruffles, with a satin fold between each cluster. These extend to the knee, and the upper part of the skirt is covered by a misty drapery of tulle, doubled, very bouffant behind, with many easy folds in front draped by clusters and sprays of great blush roses mingled with white lilacs. A square court train of tulle, widely bound with satin, is added, and the low, double-pointed corsage has soft tulle drapery on the bosom, edged with exquisite Malines lace. The flower clusters are placed with graceful irregularity on the corsage and skirts. The coiffure is a rose cluster just above the crown braid, with long sprays of half-opened buds and white lilacs drooping among the long curls. Necklace of diamonds with three stars pendent. White kid gloves reaching above the elbow. Another fresh and dainty dress of white tulle, worn by a fair young girl, had a ruche bordering the skirt, headed by clusters of pleated tulle frills with satin folds and erect pleatings. Bouffant tulle over-skirt showing no edge, but exquisitely draped with bouquets of white Marguerites. A third tulle dress was worn at the opera by Madame Gorloff, the wife of the Russian general, on the evening when the Duke and his suite were present. The trained skirt had six side pleatings of doubled tulle, held down by wide piping of white satin. Over-skirt of black lace, looped at the sides and behind by scarlet geraniums and clusters of gold balls. Low white silk corsage with peasant waist of black lace. Bouquet of scarlet leaves in front of corsage and on the left shoulder. Scarlet velvet belt and postilion bow.

WATTEAU DRESSES.

Among the dresses that have been most talked about are the Watteau costumes of faille, in which three or four colors appear. This is one of Worth's suggestions that our modistes have carried out most tastefully. A Watteau dress worn by a blonde is of pearl, rose pink, and sky blue faille. The front of the skirt shows a pearl-colored petticoat, with two bias flounces draped at the top with two aprons, the lower rose-color, the upper blue, and both edged with wide Valenciennes lace. The back of the skirt is a square court train of blue faille, trimmed with many ruffles. The corsage is a blue basque with Louis XIV. vest of rose-color, and a jabot of Valenciennes. The palest tints are used in these dresses, in order to prevent striking contrasts. One has a delicate China pink petticoat, a pearl-colored train, and white velvet pleatings; another tricolor dress has a flesh-colored skirt, Sèvres blue train, and sash of palest rose-color, tied with a loop bow on the tournure, with one wide end hanging each side; a third is violet over pale French gray; and a fourth, in Spanish colors, is a salmon skirt with sultan red train, trimmed with black Spanish blonde. This fashion suggests an economical use of two dresses partly worn, and a good way of refreshing skirts having soiled front breadths.

FAILLE DRESSES.

Many evening dresses entirely of faille have been made after the model given in Bazar No. 49, Vol. IV. Two colors usually appear in these dresses, and in many cases the short skirt is only represented by a broad front width with a sloped width on each side. The train is then very ample, and is sewed in the second seam with a wide revers turned back on the train. A very short, broad apron like the silk of the train is sometimes made to drape the upper part of the front. Three or four flounces cross the lower part of the front widths, and the train is surrounded by a ruffle. Both colors appear in the ruffles, the upper part being faced with a contrasting color, the fullness laid in double box-pleats, turned over at the top to show the facing. The corsage is of the silk of the train, with a bertha of folds of alternate colors.

The regular trained skirt, with a bouffant bat's-wing over-skirt, is a design that remains in favor for young ladies' dresses. Dresses made in this style were worn at the Duke's ball by two sisters, one fair, the other a brunette. The first was India blue faille, with over-skirt trimmed with point lace, and looped with tea-roses; the second was soft pink silk, with many fringed ruffles and petal points of the silk.

SATIN DRESSES.

Some of the richest ball dresses were of the lustrous satins that are so beautiful by gas-light. One, of water green satin, had white Venise point, a rare old lace, laid flatly on the skirt and corsage; another, of pearl-color, had an over-skirt of crape lisse edged with a flounce of round point: a rich dress, worn by an elderly lady, is of café-au-lait satin, edged with faille puffs, and trimmed with flounces and revers of Chantilly lace; an opera dress, worn by a young married lady, is a white satin skirt, with mauve tulle puffs to the knee dotted with pansies, and an over-skirt of mauve satin, with white tulle puffs and pansies; a novelty is a trained polonaise of pale blue satin, low in the neck, and bordered with white Marguerites, worn over a skirt of blue faille; an amber satin, with Watteau pleated train, is flounced with black Chantilly lace, and has corsage bouquets of pink rose-buds.

TARLATAN AND MUSLIN.

White tarlatan dresses were tastefully worn by débutantes at the late festivities. One, exceedingly fresh and pretty, had four notched ruches of tarlatan on the train, separated by marquise puffing. The bouffant over-skirt had a ruche on the edge, and was draped by pale blue ostrich tips. The low corsage was a basque of tarlatan over a Swiss muslin lining, trimmed with ruches, and with black velvet ribbon arranged across the bust, and forming a Watteau bow with long ends behind. Modistes furnish graceful dresses of white tarlatan, without flowers or feathers, for $50; white tulle dresses elaborately made, but without flowers or the silk under-skirt, are $100.

White muslin, in kilt pleating three-fourths of a yard deep, trims trained skirts of light silks—a suggestion followed by those who wish to freshen up last season's dresses. A model is a pale blue silk skirt trimmed with a single deep pleating of Swiss muslin in inch-wide pleats, all turned one way, and an inch space between; this kilting is edged below with three rows of insertion and Valenciennes lace, and headed by a pleated ruche edged with narrower Valenciennes. The Swiss over-skirt is in two parts; the front apron extends to the back like a basque, while the back is trained, and trimmed up the sides to the waist. Blue silk high corsage, with Valenciennes bretelles. Bows and loops of black velvet ribbon, and pink rose-buds.

OPERA WRAPS.

Deep Watteau mantles, large circulars, and very loose paletots are all worn for evening cloaks. White ottoman silk paletots wrought with soutache or with colored embroidery are among the handsomest. A favorite wrap this season is a talma of quilted silk covered with a black lace mantle. One arranged by a modiste has a lavender silk mantle fringed with chenille, over which a Chantilly lace point is draped, and ornamented by bows of black faille.

GENTLEMEN'S BALL DRESS.

At the Grand Duke's balls gentlemen wore low-rolled dress-coats, vests, and pantaloons of black cloth. White vests are entirely out of fashion for evening dress. A white lawn or silk neck-tie scarcely an inch wide is still in vogue; but the Grand Duke appeared in a black tie, and it is said many gentlemen to whom the clerical white is unbecoming will imitate him, and try to make the fashion general.

VARIETIES.

A new over-skirt that is much admired for silks, woolens, and for muslins over silk is longer in front than behind, requiring the back breadths of the dress to be flounced very high. To construct it take three front widths of silk a yard long, and two back breadths only three-eighths long. It opens behind, the back widths being in double box-pleats to form a postilion flounce, and the long apron breadths being gathered down the side seam.

Kilt pleating is the trimming that meets with most favor on lower skirts. It is made straight, is lined with foundation muslin, the lower edge is hemmed in loose stitches on the wrong side, a bias band holds the top flatly, and a row of stitching is placed straight around three inches above the edge.

A standing ruffle of Valenciennes lace, with a large jabot or oval rosette in front, is worn instead of a collar with dressy street toilettes in the evening. These are becoming, and more dressy than the linen collars and muslin frills worn with colored ties in the daytime. They cost from $3 50 to $13, according to the quality of the lace. Softly folded China crape edged with Valenciennes is formed into large collars, called fichu-collars, to wear with black and dark silk dresses in the house.

POINT LACE AND GUIPURE WORK.

The arrival of an abundant supply of materials for making point lace and guipure has given a fresh impetus to this fascinating employment. At the fancy stores we are told that several ladies of wealth and position here have become so proficient in darning guipure that their work excels the handsomest specimens imported. This lace is made to ornament many pretty things prepared for holiday presents. Among the handsomest are pincushions of satin—rose, blue, or green, to suit the color that prevails in the room—mounted with a square and medallion of lace. The cushion is a large square, trimmed around with quilled ribbon or a thick cord. They cost from $6 to $9. Bureau covers and toilette mats are made to match the cushion; a set costs from $8 to $20. Ornamental strips of this lace-work also pass down the middle of Oriental chairs.

HONEY-COMB CANVAS, ETC.

The new honey-comb or waffle canvas is much used for bureau covers and toilette sets. This has a braiding design lightly wrought or darned under the threads in Saxony yarn, making a simple but most effective ornament. The edge of the canvas is raveled to form a border of fringe. White canvas, darned with light blue or scarlet, is neat and tasteful. Zephyr wool is used for this broidery, but Saxony yarn is smoother, and washes better. Honey-comb canvas is a yard and a half or three-fourths of a yard in width. The widest is $1 75 a yard. Java canvas is shown in white, gray, brown, and buff, in both cotton and the firmer linen. Cotton canvas half a yard wide is 75 cents a yard; there are wider grades costing as much as $2 50 a yard. Linen Java five-eighths of a yard wide is $1 75 a yard. The stiffer Panama canvas, made of hemp, is only found in one width (five-eighths of a yard), but in two qualities, and in all the canvas colors: price $2 and $2 25 a yard. Worsted Panama canvas for sofa-pillows, traveling-bags, etc., in light colors, is $3 25 a yard. Gray Panama canvas with quilted silk lining makes pretty sachets and cases for handkerchiefs. A square with each corner folded to the centre makes a pretty case. A useful nécessaire of buff canvas is embroidered with green, has green velvet cushions in each end, pockets and bag inside, and is fastened by straps: price $8.

PERSONAL.

MR. SCOTT RUSSELL, just now a notability in England as the go-between of the aristocracy and working classes, is the son of a Scotch clergyman, and sixty-three years old. At sixteen he graduated from Glasgow University with high honors. He took to mechanics, and at twenty-eight succeeded Sir JOHN LESLIE, temporarily, as Professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. Since then he has been largely engaged in ship-building, and has made not less than 20,000 experiments for the purpose of ascertaining the laws which regulate the opposition of water to the movements of floating bodies. He is a member of a great number of scientific bodies, and was highly esteemed by the late Prince Consort.

—A New York correspondent of the Boston Advertiser, who has been taking stock of the G. Duke, says that his appearance, on the whole, is prepossessing. The impression he conveys is that he is a young man of strong will, earnest purpose, positive nature, and frank disposition, wanting, perhaps, in some of the sympathies and sensibilities which round and give grace to well-balanced character. In addition to English, which he uses with remarkable purity and fluency, he speaks German, French, Polish, Bohemian, Hungarian, Italian, and Spanish. He draws well; paints tolerably; is a clever musician, a good shot, and a capital swordsman. Being his father's favorite child, unusual pains have been taken with his education, and he is said to have employed his opportunities to the best advantage.

—The oldest living printer in the United States, Mr. JOSEPH BRADLEY, completed his ninety-sixth birthday in this city on the 20th ult. He still works at case in the Sun office, and is an expert and correct compositor. As a pleasant historical character, he is a success.

—Mr. HIGGINSON—T. W.—says, in the Woman's Journal, that "it is women, even more than men, who are attracted by those strong qualities of personal character which are always the antidote to aristocracy. No bold revolutionist ever defied the established conventionalisms of his times without drawing his strongest support from women."

—Miss KELLOGG gracefully yields her personal feelings, and consents to deposit to her credit in bank $20,000, gold, as a quid, etc., for singing twenty nights in San Francisco. It must be a sad place indeed where any lady refuses to sing unless the bad flavor is taken away by a thousand golden dollars.

—Colonel JAMES FORNEY, United States Marine Corps, a son of the venerable editor of the Philadelphia Press, has just been ordered to the navy-yard in that city. He went into the marine service when very young, and rose rapidly for gallant conduct. For eleven years he has been in active service, most of the time during the war having served with FARRAGUT, by whom he was held in high esteem. After his return from the Gulf, in 1864, he was in command in the engagement at Gunpowder Bridge, where his gallant action resulted in the defeat of Major GILMORE, then attempting a raid on the Pennsylvania border. At the end of the rebellion Colonel FORNEY was ordered to China, as fleet marine officer of the Asiatic squadron, for over three years, and while attached to the Hartford he commanded the marines against the pirates at the island of Formosa. Colonel FORNEY has seen more active service than any other officer of the Marine Corps, and has received three successive brevets in recognition of his gallantry, having been brevetted a captain, at the recommendation of FARRAGUT, for gallantry at New Orleans, a major for his engagements against the pirates in China, and a lieutenant-colonel for defeating a rebel raid on the border of Pennsylvania.

—Miss FOWLER, of Orange, a medical practitioner of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars a year standing, and having the names of over six hundred families on her books, recently decided to change her name, if not her local habitation, by becoming the wife of Mr. ORMSBY, a merchant of this city.

—Mrs. LOTTY HOUGH, formerly an actress at the Olympic Theatre at the time JEFFERSON and SOTHERN were members of the company, is making a notable success with her lecture entitled "Popping the Question." She popped it off in Boston last week to a large and warmly applauding audience.

—Mr. RICCIOTTI GARIBALDI, having no other employment so agreeable, has conquered the heart of a daughter of Madame George Sand, and proposes to lead her to the altar when the primroses come next spring.

—Lady lecturers are quite the fashion in England. Miss LYDIA BECKER, of Manchester, is one of the latest, and announces a lecture on "Illustrations of Womanly Character, derived from the Writings of Sir WALTER SCOTT."

—The Marquis of Lorne has recently made several translations from SCHILLER, besides publishing several original poems by himself.

—Mr. BANCROFT, our minister to the German empire, has the exceptional happiness of being an honorary member of thirty-one learned societies of Europe. Add to these the number to which he belongs at home, and you have, what Mr. B. is, a man who is a good deal in society.

—It having been announced that Indianapolis has a notary public named E. S. TOUT, a Louisville man impertinently asks if the initials stand for En Semble.

—Bishop MACHRAY, of Rupert's Land, has a diocese which in point of area is the largest in the world, extending as it does from the American frontier to the Arctic Ocean. The bishop is in London, endeavoring to talk £30,000 out of the pockets of Britons to establish a college in the land of Rupert.

—Are we to have TAMBERLIK, the most renowned of tenors? He has just arrived at Havana with a complete opera troupe, and commences to carol at once.

—Mr. ASHBURY, the yacht man, is a candidate for Parliament from Brighton, against a noisy Mr. FAWCET, whom he came within 164 of beating at the last election in a poll of 6000. He "protests" against FAWCET's being any longer an obstacle in his way to fame.

—In addition to his other multifarious duties, Bishop HUNTINGTON has assumed the editorship of his own official organ, the Gospel Messenger, which will hereafter be published at Syracuse.

—Miss BURDETT COUTTS, having just presented to the city of London a great fish-market, is again letting her money go to the dogs by proposing to erect a monumental drinking fountain in Edinburgh to the memory of a dog known as "Greyfriars Bobby." When Bobby's master died he was buried in Greyfriars Church-yard. Bobby followed the coffin; but when the sextons had finished their work he lay down on the grave, and there for years kept faithful watch, never leaving it except when driven by hunger to search for food. At last he died, and was buried at the foot of the grave over which he watched and mourned so long.

—The German papers do not give the name, though they ought, of the landed proprietor in Eastern Prussia who has just been prematurely cut off at the age of one hundred and twenty-nine. In youth he had been a military attendant of FREDERICK the Great. His son, a blithe young fellow of one hundred and nine, still lives on the old homestead.

—Miss BERTHA GEROLT, daughter of the late Prussian minister at Washington, has determined to enter a convent in that city, and is now making the requisite preparation. No efforts of her parents, or sister, Madame RANGABÉ, wife of the Greek minister, have been able to dissuade her from her purpose.

—Prince PIERRE BONAPARTE has been formally married to Mlle. RIFFLIN, to whom he was really married several years ago, and who has been recognized as his wife; but the Emperor LOUIS NAPOLEON refusing to recognize it, it was, by the law of France, illegal. The empire having fallen, the prince now goes through the legal forms, and his two children are now, consequently, regular and lawful BONAPARTES.

—Mr. SANTLEY, the famous baritone, now singing hereabouts, married a KEMBLE, the daughter of JOHN MITCHELL KEMBLE, eldest son of CHARLES KEMBLE, and niece of Mrs. FANNY KEMBLE. Mr. SANTLEY is a man of fine presence, and a wonderful pedestrian, doing his ten and twelve miles of a morning, and speaking of it as a mere momentary promenade.

—The man who invents a good new word is entitled to the general gratitude. Thanks, therefore, to Minister CATACAZY, who, at the entertainment given at the Naval Academy at Annapolis to the Grand Duke, proposed, as a toast, "The health of one of the co-ordinate, and certainly one of the most powerful members of the American government—their Fairnesses, the women of America." A courtesy to the minister who has been so gracefully bowed out of the country by "M. FISH," as Mr. CATACAZY styled him.

—President WHITE, of Cornell University, is on a tour, investigating the subject of the co-education of the sexes.

—It is said that there dwells in this city a lineal descendant of MARTIN LUTHER. He possesses a silver medal presented, on the centennial of LUTHER's birthday, by the King of Prussia to one of his ancestors, who was known by the then king to be a genuine LUTHER.

—General ADAM BADEAU's second volume of the "Life of General Grant" is now ready for the press, and will be issued before the close of the present month.

—Mr. FROUDE and WILKIE COLLINS are said to have determined to come to the United States to deliver lectures.

Lamp Mats, Figs. 1–4.

THESE mats are made of gray card-board, ornamented in point Russe embroidery with red Turkish cotton, and edged with a pleated paper ruffle. Take a piece of card-board seven inches square, and on it transfer the design (Figs. 64 and 65, Supplement, give a quarter section of the design in the centre of each mat, and illustrations Figs. 3 and 4 show full-sized sections of the borders). Work the embroidery as shown by the illustration, button-hole stitch the mats on the outer edges, and set the ruffle on the under side. Paste a piece of white paper of the requisite size on the under side of the mats.

Case for Pocket Comb, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS case, which is designed to hold a pocket comb, is worked with strung beads in mosaic-work from the design with description of symbols given on Fig. 71, Supplement. The design gives the back and the flap of the case; the front is worked like the back, in one piece with the latter and the flap piece. Every two symbols, counted in depth, indicate one bead. Begin at the under side of the design by stringing on 59 blue beads for a foundation. Going back on this, work with blue b. (beads) also the 1st round, first passing over the last 2 b. and drawing the thread through the third b.; then take up 1 b., pass over the next b., draw the thread through the following b., again take up 1 b., and continue to work in this manner. The illustration, Fig. 2, shows the manner of doing this. When this round is finished, three rows of transposed b. are formed, the first row by the b. of the foundation, which project, as shown by Fig. 2; the second row by those foundation b. through which the thread has been drawn in the first round; and the third row by the beads that have been newly taken up in the first round. After working the design to the 29th and 30th row of symbols (thus 28 rows of beads for the front), repeat the same part of the design for the back, and in one piece with this work the flap. For the bias side edges of the larger narrow on the outer edge by 1 b. each, as shown by the design. When the bead part is completed, lay it together as shown by Fig. 1, and overhand the double layer together on the straight ends, in doing which take up 1 blue b.

Kid Morning Slipper, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS slipper is made of French kid, trimmed with gold cord and black silk, and lined with flannel. Transfer the design, one-half of which is given on Fig. 31, Supplement, to the kid, puncture small holes along the lines of the design at intervals of one-tenth of an inch each, and sew the gold cord on the kid with black silk as shown by illustration, Fig. 2.

Linen Collar and Sleeves with Swiss Muslin Ruffles.

THE collar is made of a double layer of fine linen, and trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with Valenciennes lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and with box-pleated Swiss muslin ruffles edged with lace. Cut the collar from Fig. 24, Supplement, and as shown by the illustration; the * marked on the pattern indicates how far the Swiss muslin ruffle should extend. Cut the chemisette, to which the collar is joined, from Figs. 19 and 20, No. V., of the present Supplement. An illustration shows the sleeve for this collar. Cut the sleeves of Swiss muslin from Fig. 17, No. IV., of the present Supplement, and join them with the cuffs, which are cut of a double layer of linen from Fig. 25, Supplement. Set the Swiss muslin ruffles on the under side of the cuffs, as shown by the illustration.

On the front of the collar is a bow of black silk ribbon an inch and a quarter wide. For the foundation of the collar cut of black silk gauze one piece from Fig. 29, Supplement. On this foundation sew silk gauze folds as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern. Each fold consists of a bias strip of gauze two inches and a half wide, doubled lengthwise. Sew one fold on the upper edge of the collar in such a manner that the fold projects three-quarters of an inch over the edge, then sew on each following fold so that it falls half an inch over the one previously sewed on. When the foundation is covered with folds in this manner, trim the collar as shown by the illustration. For the foundation of the cuffs cut one piece of black silk gauze from Fig. 28, Supplement, cover it with gauze folds to correspond with the collar, trim the cuffs with lace and fringe, sew them up from 49 to 50, and sew them on the sleeves, which are cut from Fig. 17, No. IV., of the present Supplement.

Linen, Needle-work, and Lace Collar and Cuffs.

See illustrations on page 813.

THE collar and cuffs are made of fine linen; the trimming consists of gathered lace three-quarters of an inch wide, lace insertion half an inch wide, and embroidered Swiss muslin strips an inch wide; the seam made by joining the insertion with the lace is covered by a bias strip of linen one-tenth of an inch wide, which is stitched on. To make the collar cut of Swiss muslin one piece from Fig. 57, Supplement; cover this piece from the neck to the first straight line partly indicated on the pattern with fine linen, and sew on the trimming as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern. Cut away the Swiss muslin underneath the needle-work and insertion, and set a binding half an inch wide on the collar; make the cuffs to correspond with the collar from Fig. 58, Supplement.

Tatted and Needle-work Chemisette and Sleeves for Square-necked Dresses.

See illustrations on page 813.

THE chemisette is made of white Swiss muslin, and is trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with needle-work insertion three-quarters of an inch wide, tatted insertion an inch and one-tenth wide, and tatted edging an inch wide. For the chemisette cut of Swiss muslin one piece from Fig. 15, Supplement, and two pieces from Fig. 16. On the front of the chemisette, from the neck to the straight line partly indicated, baste a piece set together of needle-work and tatted insertion. Work the latter, as shown by illustration, with tatting cotton No. 120, and with two shuttles, as follows: First tie both threads together, then work, with one thread only, one leaf of 4 ds. (double stitch—one stitch left, one stitch right), 1 p. (picot), then six times alternately 3 ds., 1 p.; finally, 4 more ds. Close to this work one leaf like the preceding, but instead of forming the first p., fasten to the last p. of the preceding leaf. In connection with this leaf work one more leaf like the preceding one, then turn the work, and on the foundation thread work 6 ds., close to this, with one thread only, one ring of 6 ds., 1 p. one-fifth of an inch long, 6 ds.; close to this again on the foundation thread 8 ds., 1 short p., 8 ds., close to this, with one thread only, one small ring as before, then again on the foundation thread 6 ds. In connection with the large scallop thus formed with two small rings again work: * turning the work, one three-leaved figure as in the beginning, but, instead of forming the middle p. of the first leaf, fasten on the middle p. of the third leaf of the preceding three-leaved figure. Work another large scallop with two rings; but now, instead of forming the p. in the first of these two small rings, fasten to the p. of the last ring of the preceding scallop. Repeat from *. This completes one half of the insertion. Work the second half in a similar manner, but fasten it to the first half as shown by illustration. It must be observed, however, that the small rings of the scallops are now worked without p., and fastened to the small rings already joined in the first half. The lace on the collar is worked, as shown by the illustration, similar to the tatted insertion. Cut away the Swiss muslin underneath the part consisting of insertion, and cover the seam on the outside of the collar with the tatted lace. Join the back and fronts according to the corresponding figures, set a binding half an inch wide on the chemisette, and edge the latter with tatted lace. Buttons and button-hole stitch loops serve for closing. Cut the sleeves from Figs. 17 and 18, Supplement. Trim the cuffs, Fig. 18, with needle-work and tatted insertion as shown by the illustration, cut away the material underneath the insertion, and fasten the edges carefully. Face the outer edge of the cuffs with a strip of Swiss muslin half an inch wide, edge the cuffs with tatted lace, sew them up from 37 to the under edge, and set them, according to the corresponding figures, on the sleeves, which have previously been sewed up from 35 to 36 and from 37 to 38, and gathered on the bottom to suit the width of the cuffs.

MERCY'S RING.

WHEN Mercy Vennard was first engaged to Clovis Devonshire he placed upon her finger an antique ring, an heir-loom of the family.

"This is a historic ring, darling," he said: "for generations it has descended to the first bride of the house; it has survived many adventures, moreover, by fire and theft. But there is a saying attached to it that descends with it:

> 'Fire refuse me, thief lose me;
> It's left for water, then, to abuse me!'

which is interpreted to mean that misfortune can arrive to the wearer only through water. So take care, my dear, how you go near the water."

"Why, it is almost like having a perpetual midsummer's day about you—"

"I'm glad you think so," he interrupted her.

"—When the fairies are lying in wait at the edge of pools and rivers to drag any unwary feet beneath. But then, you know, I am in no great danger, for I don't take kindly to boating, nor to any of its kindred sports."

"I'm glad of that," he returned, almost superstitiously; "but there are other dangers. There was one betrothed lady who wore this ring—I do not fear you will resemble her, dear—she wore this ring to the undoing of her lover. It happened in this way: he saw it one day on the finger of another man. She had lent it in order to try the temper of his love; but when he saw it thus desecrated he went out and fell on his sword, her faithlessness was so plain to him; and I doubt if he would not have considered it faithlessness had he known the truth."

"I am almost afraid to wear it now," said Mercy.

"And I am sure it never fell to a sweeter hand. I trust it with you." And then he kissed the hand in question, and said good-by, and was off on an expedition to South America that promised speedy fortune; for Devonshire had only the heritage of a noble name and heart, and must needs earn a home for his love before making her his own. Clovis was to be absent three years; at the end of that time he would be certain, he argued, to return with a sufficiency that would justify their marriage.

In the mean time Mercy lived her quiet life at home, varied now and then by a trip to the sea-side or the mountains, by a visit to friends in the city, where she was wont to sit inthralled beneath the magic spell of music, or to feast her soul on the sublimities of art. But her days were not always to slip by thus smoothly, with so little to test the quality of her nature; the rival interests of life were to meet in conflict, and this conflict was inaugurated by no less a person than a young and wealthy suitor, who followed her like a shadow, who left nothing undone that could in any way further his interests—of whom every one spoke with profound admiration—and who could offer all that a worldly heart might desire. But Mercy's was hardly a worldly heart. To say that all these possibilities of wealth, all these shining attributes of her new admirer, went for nothing would be simply to tell an untruth; but it is certain that they weighed lightly beside love.

When Mr. Pontefract brought her splendid jewels, and begged her acceptance as a favor to him, she turned her eyes away with a sigh, and chose his flowers instead. When she compared—as circumstances compelled her to do—her own present rank and surroundings in the world with what she might enjoy as Mrs. Pontefract, was it much wonder if the one little grain of covetousness dormant in her nature expanded into a wish that all these vanities belonged to Mr. Devonshire? But notwithstanding this she never once dreamed of proving faithless to Clovis; she would as soon have thought of plucking out an eye because it could not help seeing the advantages of Mr. Pontefract's offer, as of uprooting her love because it was less favorably placed as regards externals—because Clovis absorbed less of the sunshine of good fortune.

However, do as she would, it was impossible for her to escape the attentions of Mr. Pontefract—attentions so subtile yet so constant that they came to resemble the dews of heaven in some respects, since they were so grateful, so gentle, so unobtrusive. Perhaps, too, they were in danger of becoming as necessary; for when one face has long smiled upon you, and one voice has entreated, you grow to feel this smile and this entreaty a part of your natural life, something that may leave an empty niche upon their withdrawal; and then, perhaps, you temporize, and make a snare for yourself. In the first place, Mr. Pontefract knew that Mercy was engaged, and to whom; in the second place, she had rejected him; but, nevertheless, so long as she treated him like a friend whom she pitied and regarded—for Mercy's gentle heart was touched by his unhappiness, and so, it may be, she gave him more kindness than was good for him—just so long would he continue to linger sighing in her pleasant neighborhood. Moreover, there were not wanting friends and relatives who recommended him to her good graces; and then one hardly needs a recommendation of a lover; the very fact of his being is enough; and, besides, Mercy knew that the dearest wish of her father's heart would be accomplished should she forget Mr. Devonshire in order to marry Mr. Pontefract; and she sometimes seriously questioned if it were not her duty to forego her own inclination, that the declining years of her father, who had met with reverses and ungratified wishes at every step in life, might be rendered happy and cheerful. Added to this, there were other friends who foresaw their own advancement in this connection, who counted upon Mr. Pontefract's influence and gold to give them a lift by the way, and accordingly manœuvred to throw the two constantly together, and to give the affair a sentimental aspect, so that in time it came to be understood and currently reported that "Miss Vennard was engaged to one man and in love with another." Such things had happened before: why not to Miss Vennard? Thus when a stranger chanced to see her in the absorbed society of her lover he naturally received this impression, and perhaps spoke of the romantic situation to a friend, who perhaps embellished it slightly, and passed it along, after the way of the world; for Mr. Pontefract was a man of consequence, well known in society and the political world, and whatever concerned him was worth repeating.

Furthermore, the non-appearance of the principal hero, Clovis, gave color to the story. The three years had elapsed, and he had not returned; indeed, he had not been so successful as he had anticipated, and, not having heard any of the rumors about his love-affair at that time, he felt no anxiety, though much disappointment, in deferring his return for two years longer. Of course Mercy's friends seized upon this as a fresh means of urging Mr. Pontefract's claims upon her. A young man who loved her devotedly would hardly spend five of the best years of his life in voluntary banishment, they reasoned. Mercy herself began to fear lest he had learned to do without her, and meant to put the lesson into practice; but, for all that, she went on loving him, just as a rose-tree in the wilderness goes on blossoming year after year, though no passer put out a hand to pluck, though no eye be delighted thereby, simply as a beautiful necessity of its nature.

When it was well into the fourth year of Mr. Devonshire's absence Mercy went down to Princeton, with her aunt, to make a summer visit at the country-seat of Mr. Pontefract, through the earnest solicitation of his mother. It was a most unwise thing to do, but her aunt was bent upon it. Mr. Pontefract himself urged it till she was weary of the subject, while her father swore he would give up his daily paper and pawn his watch unless she accepted, for she had demurred on account of expense when every thing else had failed her. So she had a few new additions to a somewhat scanty wardrobe, in the shape of white morning gowns and muslin walking dresses, a new sun-shade, and a hat wreathed with blue violets, and set forth on her way, reproaching herself vehemently, yet somewhat pleased with the prospect of variety after her prosaic life at home.

It was so pleasant down at Pontefract Place that poor Mercy found herself wishing again and again that she had been born unto such magnificence. The ceilings were so lofty; the frescoes so bewildering; the stained glass so inspiring to the imagination; the carpets so like piled moss; the gardens like miniature forests, where lovers might delightfully lose themselves; the fountains crooned such sweet sorrow in the pauses of conversation; the family plate was so dazzling; such well-trained servants, such pure-blooded horses, such an atmosphere of ease and elegance. Was it not enough to make our little girl's heart falter?—a little girl who had all her days been struggling with the giant Poverty; who had known what it was to patch and mend, and go shabby and even hungry. And yet it did not suffice to make this heart falter.

"These things are all beautiful in themselves," she thought; "but as for me, I prefer love. I could give myself away, but I do not know how to sell myself." So she satisfied her conscience with long and frequent letters to Clovis, and rode to-day with Mr. Pontefract to Crescent Hill, or played bagatelle, or sat under the lindens while he read the old dramatists to his listening guests, or danced in the moon-lighted hall, giving an unwilling ear to many a tender aside from her host, which fell, it would seem, impulsively from his lips, and without premeditation.

Thus the days slipped away like bubbles breaking in the sun, so that one hardly knew where they went. And yet she staid. Some pretext or other detained her: some visit to this neighborhood, celebrated in the annals of the country, to a battle-field of the Revolution, to the home of a poet, to the summer retreat of an artist—any thing and every thing to engage her attention, and keep her at his side, beneath his roof.

Riding home late one afternoon from one of their frequent excursions, they stopped at a farm-house to quench their thirst with a glass of cider fresh from the mill.

"I will have water instead," said Mercy, letting the well-pole slip through her hands as she lowered the mossy bucket; "cider makes me giddy and good-for-nothing."

"What are you doing, Miss Vennard?" asked Mr. Pontefract, coming to her assistance. "At least, let me bring up the bucket for you; you will bruise your hands, child."

"I! it is not the first bucket I have drawn, thank you. Ah, how it carries me back to Uncle Tom's old farm, and the strawberry fields and the ricks of new-mown hay! Isn't it strange how childhood lends its beauty to later years, and makes common things delightful through association! Ah— Oh, Mr. Pontefract, what have I done!" The bucket, half-way up, sparkling and running over, would have dropped back again had not Mr. Pontefract readily arrested it, for Mercy had snatched away her hands from the sweep, and with bent head was searching the dark depths of the well.

"What is the matter?" said Mr. Pontefract, bending over beside her; "do you see the face of your future husband below there?"

"Oh, Mr. Pontefract, I have lost my ring!" she cried.

> "'My ear-rings, my ear-rings! they've dropped into the well,
> And what to say to Musa I can not, can not tell!'

he quoted, laughingly.

"Oh, don't laugh at me, Mr. Pontefract; it was Mr. Devonshire's ring, and I have lost it!"

"Indeed! I did not mean to laugh at your distress. But never fear; I will have the well dragged. I'll send some of my servants up bright and early to-morrow morning to do the business. Come, it's a dear drink to you. Think no more about it, I pray, and let me drive you home. It will be all right to-morrow."

"Do you think so? You are so kind! I am ashamed to be so troublesome."

"And I am glad to serve you, even with his ring!" And then they drove homeward, and he made the time pass lightly by virtue of his geniality and wit, that so she might forget her misfortune.

As they came up the drive to Pontefract Place, slowly and far behind the rest of the party, a stranger pacing the veranda there bent his eyes upon them scrutinizingly. "Ah ha!" said he, under his breath; "opportunity plays the deuce with good intention. 'Out of sight, out of mind.' Poor Devonshire!" for Mr. Pontefract had so beguiled and reassured Mercy that she sat back in the carriage listening to him with the air of one but too well pleased, while he bent to her in the fading light, and held her glance with his pleading gaze. Yet he had not been discoursing of love to her; he was too wise and cautious for that.

"And you will not speak of it yet?" she asked, recurring to the loss of her ring, as he assisted her to alight.

"Ha, ha!" chuckled the stranger on the veranda; "no wonder you are ashamed of it, miss! Poor Devonshire! poor Devonshire! he hardly dreamed of this. I shall have a cordial welcome, from appearances. The deuce take it!"

"Certainly not," answered Mr. Pontefract, "if that is your wish. It shall be our secret for the nonce. As for me, I am rejoiced to share any thing with you. I am as humble as that. Little white hand!" he continued, detaining it an instant, "it shall wear its ring yet." Just then there came a heavy tread on the gravel.

"Miss Vennard, I believe?" said the stranger, stepping forward.

"Oh, Mr. Owen! where did you drop from?" Then, hastily and catching her breath, "Is—is Mr. Devonshire with you?"

"No, I left Mr. Devonshire in exile. I am only a bird of passage myself; but I promised him I would make every effort to call upon you before my return to South America, and you see I have taken the liberty of following you into this earthly paradise. You can't think how he will envy me this glimpse of you."

"You are very kind to take so much pains to serve us," she returned, leading the way into the drawing-room; "and you left Mr. Devonshire quite well?"

"Quite well, but exceedingly impatient." She was fumbling for the strings of her hat while he answered thus, and involuntarily his eyes, following the movements of her hands, perceived that they were innocent of rings.

"Just as I thought," said Mr. Owen to Mr. Owen's self: "I'm glad, at least, that she has had the grace to take it off after as good as forgetting the giver. Who knows but I may be the distinguished bearer of that famous betrothal-ring to its rightful owner? No enviable office." For Mr. Owen, being an old friend and college chum of Devonshire's, knew by heart all the ins and outs of that young gentleman's life, as well as the history and destination of the family ring.

"Why did he not come home with you," she asked, "just for a day, an hour? Do you believe he ever will come?"

"Do I believe he ever will come home? Why, Miss Vennard, that depends altogether upon you, I should think."

"I sometimes fancy I have nothing whatever to do with it."

"I can not doubt but, with such a loadstar, he will be attracted to this quarter of the globe before long," he answered, gallantly. "The little actress!" he thought; "she is sweet enough to be honest; but, the deuce! there's no trusting her as far as you can see her."

They sat there discussing by-gones, and Devonshire, and South America, till Mr. Owen, consulting his repeater, found it time to make his adieux.

"You see," he said, "I go back this day week, and I'm pressed for time. I ran down here because I wouldn't return to the south without seeing you for a gold mine; Devonshire would never forgive me. So, if you've any keepsake or package to send him, I shall be most happy to take it, and make myself welcome to him."

"Thank you. I have a keepsake I should like to send, if—if—it won't trouble you."

"Not a bit, I assure you. If you will have it left at my brother's office in Boston, 90 Kilby Street. I suppose that Mr. Pontefract goes into the city often; he'll attend to it for you, I've no doubt."

"With the greatest pleasure," said that gentleman, who, drawing near at this point, had overheard the words of both. "Let me see—when do you leave, Mr. Owen?"

"This day week."

"So soon?" musingly. "Well, I go up to the city to attend a meeting of the directors of the Flushing Bank on the sixteenth; that's two days before you leave. Will that answer?"

"Perfectly," said Mr. Owen.

"A little 'keepsake?'" he muttered, walking back to his hotel. "I was sure of it from the first."

"You go up on the sixteenth," said Mercy, after Mr. Owen had gone, with a glance full of admiration for Mr. Pontefract, who could so gracefully put aside his own feelings as to assist in forwarding a "keepsake" to his successful rival. "I will have it in readiness, then," she added, "and it will not be a very burdensome affair."

"But very precious," insisted Mr. Pontefract, who somehow divined its nature.

"I don't know about that," she answered, doubtfully. "What is precious to one may be worthless to another."

So when the morning of the sixteenth opened, Mr. Pontefract reminded Mercy of her duty, when they found themselves alone in the breakfast-room for a few seconds. "You know," said he, "that I am off for the city to-day. Is your precious parcel in readiness?"

"Here it is, thank you."

"Thank me for nothing, Mercy," he returned, holding the little package in his palm, and regarding her intently.

"Mr. Pontefract," she essayed, after a pause, "is there no news about—about my ring?" Mr. Pontefract gave a little start, and walked to the window. "I have sent the men and had the well drained," said he—"every inch of it; and I hardly know how to tell you, Mercy, but there is no ring there! I have delayed saying this to you, because I have inserted an advertisement in the Daily News and the Evening Visitor, and though I have heard nothing from them, yet there is hope. But I fear you may have lost it in some other way. Think: are you quite certain it was on your finger when you reached the well? Might you not have pulled it off with your glove?"

"No; I heard it hit the water as it fell. I am confident of that."

"That might have been a pebble which the bucket had dislodged and thrown down, might it not?"

"I hardly think so"—the tears beginning to fringe her eyelashes. "But the men who drained the well, were they—were they honest, do you think?"

"I have every reason to believe so. They have been in my service for years. They have good wages and good names—too precious to risk. No; I can vouch for them."

"Then I must give it up!"

"I should advise differently. Let us wait a while, at least. I shall offer a tempting reward. Don't despair, little one. And now this precious parcel must be on its way. Well, good-morning. Enjoy yourself as well as you can without me to-day; for my part, I shall enjoy nothing but the anticipation of the evening." And while she was thinking in what words to thank him for his considerate kindness, he was already on his way to Boston, with the "keepsake" secure in his breast pocket—the "keepsake," which was simply a gold locket containing a little picture of Mercy's tender face—like the face of an angel looking out of a cloud—which Mr. Devonshire had begged her to send him, as the one she gave him when they parted had met with a misfortune while accompanying him on his excursions.

"Such disinterested kindness!" thought Mercy, going over the occurrences of the morning: "ah, if one only had two hearts at one's disposal!" But, for all that, she did not feel at all called upon, having but one, to reward him with the gift of that.

Mercy and her aunt returned home shortly after this, Mercy in a somewhat depressed state of mind, owing to the fact that the ring had not yet come to light. Mr. Pontefract had made every effort in her behalf, she earnestly believed, and had entreated her not to renounce hope; and she was just sitting down to acquaint Mr. Devonshire with the misfortune, when a South American mail arrived, bringing to her a box containing all the letters of the past four years which she had written to Mr. Devonshire, together with the curl of her beautiful hair that he had cut away with his penknife one evening long ago, the faded rose she had worn in its blushing heyday, the ribbon that had once adorned her throat, the glove he had stolen, and these lines:

"Mr. Owen has brought me the 'keepsake' which you delivered to him. I accept it cheerfully; and though henceforth we are stranger than strangers to each other, believe me I shall intrust it to the care of no other mortal. CLOVIS DEVONSHIRE."

Mercy comprehended the situation at the first glance with the intuition of a sensitive nature. She took it like a sword thrust into her heart, and covered the wound as best she might. He had forgotten her; he had done loving her forever and forever; but he kept her picture as one keeps a fragment of some fragrant sentiment in a secret corner of one's heart, to look at now and then and dream over, to be reminded by its faint perfume of what might have been. That was all. That was the end of her four years' weary waiting and longing and loving; that was the end of love's young dream, of the illusion of life, of happiness. The world was a waste place henceforth; the very birds sang in the minor key; there was a shadow passing over the sun. Her aunt naturally took care to inform Mr. Pontefract of this new state of things; and what lover is generous enough to forget himself at such a crisis? In the mean time Mercy was in great perplexity: what should she do about the ring—the family ring, which was to descend to the future brides of all the Devonshires—which she had unwittingly forfeited? How tell him she had lost what no money could purchase? How make amends for her fault? Therefore, after enduring much suffering, she carried her trouble before Mr. Pontefract, as her only secure and wise friend; for, since the withdrawal of Devonshire, she had begun to feel a sort of possession in Mr. Pontefract, and a reliance upon his good-will and favor.

"Sit down this instant," he commanded, when she had stated to him her anxiety, "and explain the whole affair to him. It is his right, and all you can do. Come, I am going to the mail myself. I will see to it, and then it will be off your mind. You can hardly offer to pay for the ring, and it's hardly likely he will accuse you of embezzling after that." So the letter was written, bearing only on the subject; not a word of reproach, not a syllable of regret, except for the loss of the bauble, for she would not have him believe that she retained the symbol when the thing symbolized had ceased to exist.

And now, at this time, what a staff was Mr. Pontefract to lean upon: no reed shaken by the wind, but a friend in need—a surety whose actions seemed to declare, "Though all the world should cast you off, I only love you the better."

Thus the wound throbbed and throbbed with every breath, with every thought, and she grew so accustomed to its anguish that she was hardly conscious when, by-and-by, there came a lull, when it ceased to sting. It may be that this was owing to the constant companionship and delicate kindness of Mr. Pontefract, who, never once alluding to his own feelings, constituted himself her champion, and made her welfare his business and delight. Thus she came to regard him first as the paragon among men, so disinterested, so noble-minded, so true, bearing his own blight with such high courage and fortitude. Surely he presented an imposing contrast to that other lover who had thrown her love aside without an apology; then, in the second place, she began to wish that some day she might repay him with a little affection; and since with some to wish is to will, since the wish is sometimes but the shadow of its own fulfillment, she questioned at last if she were not already touched by his tender endeavor, by the silent reiteration of his regard. So it happened, when he came into her presence, her smile shed such a brightness about the place that it seemed to him as if he had entered into a room full of sunshine and flowers. He paused an instant in the door-way, bewildered, as it were, by this revelation, this accomplishment of his hopes, this fruition of his labors; for he had not loved and toiled so long without being able to recognize the first transformation in the beloved face. Then his heart gave a great plunge in his bosom, and sank like a stone. Why had it not come before, this that he had longed for? Why not before, when its lustre had been untarnished by self-reproach? It was so sweet to him that at the first impulse he could have put it away as something too divine for such as he; his nobler nature rose in protest against it, remembering that so it had once seemed dear to Clovis Devonshire! Oh, if it could have been his own, had the price been simply love, then would it have been like rain after long drought, like the wind in sails becalmed! Now its very preciousness was painful. All this, however, was but the torment of an instant; then he had crossed the room and bent above her.

"Look upon me forever so, dearest," he said; "then I shall believe that you love me."

"And faith works miracles," she answered him.

Their lips met, they saw themselves reflected in each other's eyes. At that moment, it appeared to him, his soul went out on the long search for hers. But can the weak soul overtake the strong? Can love breathe the same atmosphere with selfishness? Is not the reward always commensurate to the labor?

They were to be married in the spring—in the time of violets, when all sweet things renew their life and beauty. Mercy's time was now too entirely occupied with the arrangements and details of her approaching wedding to allow her to reflect upon the past; and then, if she missed the freshness of her first love, she was none the less satisfied that this was best for her, more enduring, more robust, partaking more of the nature of the eternal verities. She regarded him now as one among a thousand—a man whose integrity was the shining ensample of his contemporaries. If he said so, it must be so; if he did thus, it was right. Such magnificent reliance on a fallible nature showed a heart utterly incapable of unworthy suspicions, reposing infinite confidence in humanity. But then he had in a measure earned this golden opinion: when he had promised, he had been earnest to perform. And, moreover, when they had conversed together upon the interests of the soul, he had expressed such hearty conviction of his short-comings that she had been filled with admiration in discovering humility in a being so excellent; and the more he bewailed the narrowness of life, which had, perhaps, driven him to barter many of the beauties of the spirit for earthly goods, the more her heart went out to him in affectionate compassion and absolute trust.

The mother of Mr. Pontefract, delighted with the prospect of a daughter, and the fact that her son had proved victorious, had insisted upon having Mercy with her again, for a few weeks, that so they might grow accustomed to each other's ways, and talk over the pleasant event together. And Mercy was enjoying the fleeting moments with all the capacity of youth for enjoyment, when Mr. Pontefract was summoned away on urgent business. He was to depart on the morrow, and as they said their last words in the moon-lighted music-room, with the last chords of Beethoven's Sonata still vibrating in the air, Mercy felt like one in a delicious dream—felt that greater happiness had been granted her than she had dared to desire, that not one woman in a thousand was so content, so blessed as she!

She recalled that evening, only one week later, and could have wished that then and there, leaning on her lover's arm, believing in him, loving him—that then time had ceased for her, and eternity had petrified her love and faith, that they might suffer no further change for evermore.

The night had set in cheerlessly, with great gusts of wind and rain tapping at the windows and twisting the naked boughs without. Mercy, sitting alone in the library, was wishing that her lover might suddenly enter, throwing open the doors with a cheery noise, as was his wont, bringing with him a perfume of frosty air: the house was so still without him—like a great lonely ruin haunted with sweet ghosts of thought and memory—the guests were so commonplace. Mrs. Pontefract had gone to bed with a headache, and the servants were just lighting the gas in the hall, when some one tapped gently at the library door.

"Oh, it is you, Meg?" said Mercy, starting reluctantly from her reverie before the flickering blaze on the hearth. "Is Mrs. Pontefract worse? Would she like me to go to her?"

"Not that, miss," returned Meg, shyly. "It's sound asleep that she is, miss. It's something I'd be after saying to ye meself."

"Yes?" said Mercy, turning up the gas.

"It's something," pursued Meg, "that Jacob, the coachman, minded me to tell ye;" and here Meg colored and paused, for Jacob was known to be sweet on pretty Meg.

"Yes?" reiterated Mercy, hardly curious.

"It's something he found this morning in the breast pocket of his best coat, miss; he'd have give it to the master, but you're most the same now, he says, and the master away. Mr. Pontefract gave him the coat, miss, you see, and it was almost as good as new, saving a rent in the sleeve of it; and Jacob he hasn't wore the coat but once since it was give to him, and that was at his sister's wedding, a month come Saturday week, when he hadn't no occasion to use the breast pocket, his mind was so took up with the merry-making. So it was only this morning, as I was a-saying, that he put in his hand, and, says he, he says, 'Here's something master's clean forgot; take it up to the mistress, Meg;' and as the mistress was sound asleep, I took it upon me to bring it to you, miss. Of course," she added, apologetically, "Mr. Pontefract wouldn't be so like to miss it, and the 'riginal here: leastways so Jacob says;" and then Meg placed a small parcel on the library table, and went out.

Mercy left it undisturbed for a few moments. "I don't know as it is my business," she thought, "though one would suppose that Jacob had found a gold mine;" and then, from sheer desperation and ennui, she took up the parcel, tore off the ragged envelope in which it was wrapped, and paused, stunned and affrighted, before a tiny gold locket, disclosing a picture of herself—the little "keepsake" she had sent to Clovis Devonshire by Mr. Owen! How had it come into the possession of Mr. Pontefract? What "keepsake," then, had Mr. Devonshire received and acknowledged? She saw all the treachery, all the cruel fraud, in a flash. Mr. Pontefract had found the ring, and had substituted it for the picture in the parcel she had delivered to his care; and as a murderer sometimes retains about him, by some strange fatality, the very thing that will secure his conviction, so Mr. Pontefract had retained her picture, because he could not bring himself to destroy the image of her he loved.

What should any reasonable woman have done under the circumstances? Should she have written to Mr. Devonshire and explained? But Mercy had loved Mr. Pontefract, and one can not forget in the twinkling of an eye. And then, what if Mr. Devonshire had followed her example and loved again? Therefore she chose the hardest way—she waited. And one fine spring day, a whole year later, he came in, like a son of the house, and straight to where Mercy sat at work.

"I am a little later than I thought to be," he said. "Shall I come in, Mercy?"

"Mr. Devonshire!" she cried, stretching out her hands, and withdrawing them as instantly. "You have come back because—because—"

"Because I love you, Mercy; because some one has lately been so kind as to write me word how a certain ring having dropped into a well was found by my rival, and dispatched to me in the place of a very lovely picture which had been promised. Mercy, I said truly when I wrote you that I should intrust my ring to no other mortal. I have brought it back to you, dear; will you wear it again?"

"And you will trust it to me?"

"With all my heart!"

"And the letter, Clovis?" she asked, one day; "you never told me who enlightened you? Was it my aunt?"

"It was not your aunt, love. Mercy, dear, the letter was a contrite confession, and it was signed 'Francis Pontefract.'"

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IT is curious to observe—and yet it is altogether a natural sequence—how some special event arouses, with sudden impetuosity, all our slumbering interest in a country or people that had previously been to us only like other countries and people. The advent of Prince Alexis has invested Russian history with a charm hitherto unknown, especially among those to whom facts always seem dry. There will never be a more favorable time than now to remind such that the Russian empire includes an area of 7,862,568 square miles. European Russia has a population of 61,325,923; Government of Caucasus, 4,157,917; Siberia, 4,625,699; Kingdom of Poland, 5,100,000; Grand Duchy of Finland, 1,798,909—making a total of 77,008,448 inhabitants. Within the circuit of the Russian empire are more than a hundred tribes, speaking as many different languages; but most of these live on the frontiers of the country, the Russians proper inhabiting the interior. In Russia the emperor's will is law, but the administration of the empire is intrusted to four great councils. The commercial intercourse of Russia is chiefly with Prussia, Great Britain, and France, though Asia and China come in for a share. The chief trading ports are St. Petersburg and Riga, on the Baltic; Archangel, on the White Sea; Odessa, on the Black Sea; Taganrog, on the Sea of Azof; and Astrakhan and Baku, on the Caspian Sea. Moscow is the principal entrepôt of the interior commerce of the empire. The czar is now making earnest efforts to promote the cause of education among his people. Much progress has been made within the last quarter of a century; still, among the common people, education is very deficient. The number of school-attending children is stated to be as one to 140. In 1865 there were in Russia 328 periodical papers, of which 143 were published in St. Petersburg.

Professor Agassiz was altogether correct when he told the teachers assembled in convention at Boston that he thought in public education "too much was made of the memory, and too little of the mind."

A twenty-four-year-old American lady has just been admitted to the dignity of Doctor of Medicine at Zurich. She passed a brilliant examination, which attracted a large audience.

A Chicago lady, writing concerning the time immediately following the conflagration, says that people from other cities were in such nervous haste they did not stop to consider what was most needed, but sent every thing they could lay their hands on—ball dresses, theatrical costumes, white vests, and lavender gloves, piled in with homespun jeans. "Only Boston, never in her intellectual pride impulsive, telegraphed to know what was most needed; and what elegant clothing the noble citizens of the Hub sent when they received the answer, 'Every thing!' One dear old lady sent some brocade silks, made in the style of 1700, with immense sleeves puffed out with cider-down, and short waists with big puffs. They are really too precious to give away. We will have tableaux in the church this winter for the benefit of the sufferers, and use them in that way."

It is not enough, in this hurrying age, to send little folks to school as soon as they can fairly speak and safely walk, and stuff them with book-learning till their little heads whirl and ache. The very latest style suggested is the infusion of scientific instruction into the minds of babies through the medium of nursery rhymes! For example:

"Sing a song of acids,
Base and alkali—
Four-and-twenty gases
Baked into a pie;
When the pie was opened,
Wonderful to say,
Oxygen and nitrogen
Both flew away."

The initials D. C., after Washington, are now understood to mean "Dirty City." For two or three months past the inhabitants of the capital have been "mending their ways;" and the amount of mud, loose paving-stones, second-hand bricks, and miscellaneous rubbish developed along the streets by the progress of improvement is fearful to the pedestrian. But the city enjoys fine fall weather, and is rapidly filling up with visitors. The streets will soon be in better order than ever before; and there are general anticipations of an unusually pleasant season.

The bell worn by the cow that kicked over the lamp that set fire to Chicago is on exhibition at sixty-one different places in that city—at least so says a Chicago local.

The day before Thanksgiving, as a forerunner of that time-honored festival, and a little in advance of his proper time, Winter made his appearance in New York. Little folks shouted and old folks shivered, to see the whitened ground and feel the whistling wind. Skates and overcoats, sleds and flannels, little shovels and big ones, were equally in demand. Perhaps this cold day, coming just before the national Turkey-day, was a fortunate reminder to those who lacked nothing comfortable that thousands in our great city would be thankful for a gift of food, fuel, or clothing. But New York is ever open-handed—and the Thanksgiving of this year was no exception to those of past years in charitable donations.

Russia should be a healthy country. It has only 10,000 doctors, which is about one to 7182 persons. In some districts, if a physician is wanted, a day's journey must be performed to reach one.

While the flames were devouring the North Side of Chicago, a clergyman met a bewildered young man in Chicago Avenue. "Where am I?" he asked. On being informed, he said, "Well, I've been married three weeks; I don't know where my wife is; but if she is burned, it is the Lord's will: let her go." And off he started.

There should be a city ordinance against throwing fruit skins upon the sidewalks. How many broken limbs and lame backs are due to bits of apple, orange, and banana skins is not generally known.

A correspondent of the Milwaukee Wisconsin, who has been traveling through the burned regions of Wisconsin, says that 400 square miles are utterly devastated in the country from Brown County to Big Sturgeon Bay. At least 400 farms in this tornado section alone are left desolate—stripped of every improvement. Fences, barns, dwellings, implements, furniture, wagons, harness, and crops all went up in a "whirlwind of fire." It will take thirty years, in that cold, hard soil, for their timber to grow again. In the aggregate their losses must foot up to $1000 a family. In the Belgian settlement on Red River sixty-two families were burned out in a row. Not a house, not a shed, not a coop—not one fence rail left upon another. The families had fled, almost naked and breathless, to the few cabins on the outskirts that were saved.

The olive crop of the Mediterranean countries has been seriously injured by the protracted drought. Substitutes for salad oil will be in demand.

It so chanced that there was a wedding in a Broadway church on the day of the Grand Duke's arrival—for even dukes can not keep people from marrying. But to invited guests and lookers-on a live prince was a rarer sight than even a "happy couple." So they only waited for the bride to walk up the aisle, when, leaving the bridal party to the tender mercies of the clergyman, they rushed into the street in time to see the procession and him it delighted to honor.

Amidst the pathetic scenes which were witnessed in the churches which were made places of refuge for the Chicago sufferers there were some curious incidents. A lady who assisted in ministering to the homeless observed, in one corner of a church of refuge, a German woman with nine children of all sizes. She inquired,

"Where is your husband?"

"Ach, Gott in himmel! I took the children and he took the feather-bed, and he was so slow I think he got burned up mit the feather-bed. There was no water, and all the men on the North Side drinked beer and whisky, and then they could not go fast. If I had taken the feather-bed mineself, now I would have it."

"Yes; but you should be thankful that you have all your children," it was suggested.

"Aber! what can I do mit the children mitout a feather-bed?" she asked, in astonishment.

Incendiary fires in the neighborhood of Moscow continue to be reported. The flames have been raging extensively in the forests; and in certain towns churches, warehouses, and hundreds of houses have been consumed, besides immense quantities of merchandise.

"Mamma," said a little girl the other day, while passing through Fulton Market, "what place is this? It looks like a great hen-house!" We think the criticism just and suggestive. Many respectable hen-houses are far cleaner than are some parts of our great Fulton Market.

Pitts is a capital business hand. He examines the goods he is thinking of purchasing, and then says: "Well, I'll look around, and if I don't find any thing that suits me better, I'll call and take this." Not long ago Pitts said to himself, "I am getting rather 'long in years, and guess I'll get married." His business qualities wouldn't let him wait; so, calling upon a lady friend, he opened the conversation by remarking that he would like to know what she thought about his getting married. "Oh, Mr. Pitts," she replied, "that is an affair in which I am not so very greatly interested, and I prefer to leave it with yourself." "But," says Pitts, "you are interested; and, my dear girl, will you marry me?" The young lady blushed very red, hesitated, and finally, as Pitts was very well to do in the world, and morally and financially of good standing in society, she accepted him; whereupon the matter-of-fact Pitts responded, "Well, well, I'll look about; and if I don't find any body that suits me better than you, I'll come back."

Ladies' Winter Bonnets, Hats, and Caps, Figs. 1–7.

Fig. 1.—DRESS CAP OF TULLE AND FLOWERS. This cap is made of black tulle and white lace, and is trimmed with black silk ribbon and white flowers with long drooping sprays. The crown of the cap is made of a double layer of black stiff lace and covered wire from Fig. 56, Supplement.

Fig. 2.—BROWN VELVET BONNET. On the front of this bonnet is a row of loops of brown gros grain ribbon three inches wide, covered each by loops of black tulle and lace. The tulle loops, however, are not made separately, but of a single strip ten inches wide, which is edged with lace an inch and a quarter wide. One end of this strip is fastened on the left side of the bonnet, and extends in the form of a long band to the back edge of the bonnet, where it is arranged in a standing loop, and left to hang sixteen inches long in the back; the end of the strip is sloped off (see illustration). On the right side of the bonnet, extending to the middle of the back, is a piece of gros grain ribbon, slightly rounded, the ends of which hang half a yard long in the back. The stitches that fasten the tulle loop on the back of the bonnet are covered with a pleated band of brown velvet. The strings are of brown ribbon thirty-one inches long. The remaining trimming consists of brown velvet flowers and leaves. A ruche of black lace is set inside of the bonnet on the front edge. For the frame of the bonnet (see page 812) cut of a double layer of white stiff lace one piece from Fig. 54, Supplement, arrange the front in one piece from Fig. 55, Supplement, with white covered wire, then cover the front, formed of wire only, with a double layer of gathered white cotton lace. Sew up the pleats indicated on Fig. 54, sew wire on the edge and Figs. 3 and 4.—BLACK VELVET BONNET WITH REVERS. This bonnet is trimmed with a black tulle scarf and white flowers with long drooping sprays. Black velvet strings. Make the frame for the bonnet (see page 812) of a double layer of white stiff lace and covered wire from Figs. 52 and 53, Supplement. Cover the frame smoothly with velvet, and bind the revers on the outer edge with velvet half an inch wide. Along the back edge of the bonnet set a piece of pleated black velvet ribbon three inches wide, the ends of which form strings seven-eighths of a yard long. On the middle of the back edge set the pleated end of a scarf of black figured tulle a yard and a quarter long and half a yard wide, which is edged all around with black lace an inch wide. Wind the scarf about the bonnet, and fasten it on the back so that the other end hangs down about five-eighths of a yard long in the back. Finish with loops and ends of black velvet ribbon and flowers, and a ruche of pleated black lace.

Fig. 5.—OLIVE GREEN VELVET ROUND HAT. This hat is trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with a standing ruffle of olive green gros grain, the seam of which is covered by a roll of velvet. The remaining trimming consists of gros grain loops and ends, a black tulle scarf edged with lace, a tuft of white heron feathers, and a bird.

Fig. 6.—BLACK VELVET ROUND HAT. The trimming for this hat consists of a wreath of small black ostrich feathers, a bow of black velvet, a scarf a yard long and half a yard wide edged with lace, and a red rose with clusters of black elder-berries. The flowers are partly hidden by the scarf. On the back of the hat set a piece of black velvet ribbon, which is left to hang down there as long as the scarf. Make the frame of the hat (see page 812) of a double layer of white stiff lace and covered wire from Figs. 50 and 51, Suppl., each in one piece.

Fig. 7.—ROYALE VELVET ROUND HAT. This hat is made of gray royale velvet. The revers is covered with a bias piece of gray velvet. On the upper edge of the hat set a piece of gray gros grain ribbon, doubled in the middle so as to form hanging ends in the back, one three-quarters of a yard and the other a yard and an eighth long. Both ends are fringed out four inches wide, and knotted in tassels as shown by the illustration. Sew the longer end of the ribbon, at the distance of half a yard from the fringed end, to the inner edge on the back of the hat, so that the upper part of this ribbon forms a loop. On the right side of the hat fasten several ribbon loops, a tuft of white heron feathers, and a bird, and on the back set a black ostrich feather. The frame of the hat (see page 812) is made of a double layer of white stiff lace and covered wire from Figs. 47-49, Supplement.

PORT-FOLIO FOR MUSIC, ETC.

For design see Supplement, No. XXIII., Fig. 59.

Port-folio for Music, etc.

THIS port-folio is made of thick cigar-box boards, and is trimmed with dark brown carriage leather, and tied with brown silk ribbons. Take two cigar-box boards eleven inches and a quarter wide and seventeen inches long. On the outer edge of these boards paste a strip of carriage leather an inch wide, which overlaps the under side half its width. Cut a slit in each side at a distance of an inch and a quarter from the edge and four inches from each end, and through these slits draw the strings in such a manner as to fasten the boards together. Transfer the design given on Fig. 59, Supplement, to thick paper, paste the latter on the under side of a piece of carriage leather of the requisite size, cut out the carriage leather along the edges indicated, and paste the trimming on the port-folio. Work the figure on the middle of the port-folio as shown by the illustration; one of the corner figures, however, may be substituted for this. To make the design figures glazed paper may be used instead of carriage leather. Pasteboard and silk may be used instead of the cigar-box boards.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

STOLEN HOURS.

MISS GRANGER'S portrait was finished, and the baby-picture—a chubby blue-eyed cherub at play on a bank of primroses, with a yellow-hammer perched on a blossoming blackthorn above his head, and just a glimpse of blue April sky beyond; a dainty little study of color, in which the painter had surpassed himself—was making rapid progress, to the young mother's intense delight. Very soon Mr. Austin would have no longer the privilege of coming every other day to the Rue de Morny. Daniel Granger had declined sitting for his portrait.

"I did it once," he said. "The Bradford people insisted upon making me a present of my own likeness, life-size, with my brown cob, Peter Pindar, standing beside me. I was obliged to hang the picture in the hall at Arden—those good fellows would have been wounded if I hadn't given it a prominent position; but that great shining brown cob plays the mischief with my finest Velasquez, a portrait of Don Carlos Baltazar, in white satin slashed with crimson. No; I like your easy, dashing style very much, Mr. Austin; but one portrait in a lifetime is quite enough for me."

As the Granger family became more acclimatized, as it were, Clarissa found herself with more time at her disposal. Sophia had attached herself to a little clique of English ladies, and had her own engagements and her separate interests. Clarissa's friends were, for the most part, Frenchwomen, whom she had known in London, or to whom she had been introduced by Lady Laura. Mr. Granger had his own set, and spent his afternoons agreeably enough, drinking soda-water, reading Galignani, and talking commerce or politics with his compeers at the most respectable café on the boulevards. Being free, therefore, to dispose of her afternoons, Clarissa, when Lovel's picture was finished, went naturally to the Rue du Chevalier Bayard. Having once taken her servants there, she had no farther scruples.

"They will think I come to see a dress-maker," she said to herself. But in this she did not give those domestic officers credit for the sharpness of their class. Before she had been three times to her brother's lodgings, John Thomas, the footman, had contrived—despite his utter ignorance of the French tongue—to discover who were the occupants of No. 7, and had ascertained that Mr. Austin, the painter, was one of them.

"Who'd have thought of her coming to see that chap Hostin?" said John Thomas to the coachman. "That's a rum start, ain't it?"

"Life is made up of rum starts, John Thomas," replied the coachman, sententiously. "Is there a Mrs. Hostin, do you know?"

"Yes, he's got a wife. I found that out from the porter, though the blessed old buffer can't speak any thing but his French gibberish. 'Madame?' I said, bawling into his stupid old ear. "Mossoo and Madame Hostin? comprenny?' and he says, 'Ya-ase,' and then bursts out laughing, and looks as proud as a hen that's just laid a hegg—'ya-ase, mossoo et madame.'"

George Fairfax and Clarissa met very frequently after that ball at the embassy. It happened that they knew the same people; Mr. Fairfax, indeed, knew every one worth knowing in Paris; and he seemed to have grown suddenly fond of respectable society, going every where in the hope of meeting Mrs. Granger, and rarely staying long any where if he did not meet her. There were those who observed this peculiarity in his movements, and shrugged their shoulders significantly. It was to be expected, of course, said this butterfly section of humanity: a beautiful young woman, married to a man old enough to be her father, would naturally have some one interested in her.

Sometimes Clarissa met George Fairfax in her brother's painting-room; so often, indeed, that she scarcely cared to keep an account of these meetings. Austin knew a good many clever, agreeable Americans and Frenchmen, and his room was a pleasant lounge for idle young men, with some interest in art, and plenty to say upon every subject in the universe. If there were strangers in the painting-room when Mrs. Granger came to the Rue du Chevalier Bayard, she remained in the little salon, talking to her sister-in-law and the two precocious nephews; but it happened generally that George Fairfax, by some mysterious means, became aware of her presence, and one of the folding-doors would open presently, and the tall figure appear.

"Those fellows have fairly smoked me out, Mrs. Austin," he would say.—"Ah, how do you do, Mrs. Granger? I hope you'll excuse any odor of Victorias and Partagas I may bring with me. Your brother's Yankee friends smoke like so many peripatetic furnaces."

And then he would plant himself against a corner of the mantel-piece, and remain a fixture till Clarissa departed. It was half an hour's talk that was almost a tête-à-tête—Bessie Lovel counted for so little between those two. Half an hour of dangerous happiness, which made all the rest of Mrs. Granger's life seem dull and colorless; the thought of which even came between her and her child.

Sometimes she resolved that she would go no more to that shabby street on the "Surrey side;" but the resolve was always broken. Either Austin had asked her to come for some special reason, or the poor little wife had begged some favor of her, which required personal attention: there was always something.

Those were pleasant afternoons, when the painting-room was empty of strangers, and Clarissa sat in a low chair by the fire, while George Fairfax and her brother talked. Austin was never so brilliant as in George's company; the two men suited each other, had lived in the same world, and loved the same things. They talked of all things in heaven and earth, touching lightly upon all, and with a careless kind of eloquence that had an especial fascination for the listener. It seemed as if she had scarcely lived in the dull interval between those charmed days at Hale Castle and these hours of perilous delight; as if she had been half stifled by the atmosphere of common-sense which had pervaded her existence—crushed and borne down by the weight of Daniel Granger's sober companionship. This was fairy-land—a region of enchantment, full of bright thoughts and pleasant fancies; that a dismal level drill-ground, upon which all the world marched in solid squares, to the monotonous cry of a sergeant-major's word of command. One may ride through a world of weariness in a barouche-and-pair. Clarissa had not found her husband's wealth by any means a perennial source of happiness, nor even the possession of Arden an unfailing consolation.

It was strange how this untidy painting-room of Austin's, with its tawdry, dilapidated furniture—all of which had struck her with a sense of shabbiness and dreariness at first—had grown to possess a charm for her. In the winter gloaming, when the low wood fire glowed redly on the hearth, and made a flickering light upon the walls, the room had a certain picturesque aspect. The bulky Flemish cabinets, with their coarse florid carving, stood boldly out from the background, with red gleams from the fire reflected on chubby cherub heads and medieval monsters. The faded curtains lost their look of poverty, and had only the sombre air of age; an old brass chandelier of the Louis Quatorze period, which Austin had hung in the centre of his room, flashed and glittered in the uncertain light; and those two figures—one leaning against the mantel-piece, the other prowling restlessly to and fro as he talked, carrying a mahl-stick, which he waved ever and anon like the rod of a magician—completed the picture. It was a glimpse of the behind-the-scenes in the great world of art, a peep into Bohemia; and oh, how much brighter a region it seemed to Clarissa than that well-regulated world in which she dined every day at the same hour, with four solemn men watching the banquet, and wound up always with the same dismal quarter of an hour's sitting in state at dessert!

Those stolen hours in Austin's painting-room had too keen a fascination for her. Again and again she told herself that she would come no more, and yet she came. She was so secure of her own integrity, so fenced and defended by womanly pride, that she argued with herself there could be neither sin nor danger in these happy respites from the commonplace dreariness of her life. And yet, so inconsistent is human nature, there were times when this woman flung herself upon the ground beside her baby's crib, and prayed God to pardon her iniquities.

Austin was much too careless to be conscious of his sister's danger. George Fairfax had made an afternoon lounge of his rooms in the previous winter; it was no new thing for him to come there three or four times a week, and Austin did not for a moment suspect that Clarissa's occasional presence had any thing to do with these visits.

When the three portraits were finished, Mr. Granger expressed himself highly content with them, and gave Austin Lovel a check for three hundred pounds; a sum which, in the painter's own words, ought to have set him upon his legs. Unhappily, Austin's legs, from a financial point of view, afforded only the most insecure basis—were always slipping away from him, in fact. Three hundred pounds in solid cash did not suffice for even his most pressing needs. He saw nothing before him but the necessity of an ignominious flight from Paris. It was only a question of when and where he should fly; there was no question as to the fact.

He did not care to tell Clarissa this, however. It would be time enough when the thing was done, or just about to be done. All his life he had been in the habit of shirking unpleasant subjects, and he meant to shirk this as long as he could. He might have borrowed money of George Fairfax, no doubt; but, unfortunately, he was already in that gentleman's debt for money borrowed during the previous winter; so he scarcely cared to make any new appeal in that quarter.

So the unsubstantial Bohemian existence went on; and to Clarissa, for whom this Bohemian was an utterly new world, it seemed the only life worth living. Her brother had been pleased to discover the ripening of her artistic powers, and had given her some rough-and-ready lessons in the art she loved so well. Sometimes, on a bright wintry morning, when Mr. Granger was engaged out-of-doors, she brought her port-folio to the Rue du Chevalier Bayard, and painted there for an hour or so. At first this had been a secure hour for unreserved talk with her brother; but after she had been there two or three mornings in this way, Mr. Fairfax seemed mysteriously aware of her movements, and happened to drop in while she was taking her lesson.

It is not to be supposed that Clarissa could be so much away from home without attracting the attention of Miss Granger. Whether that young lady was at home or abroad, she contrived to keep herself always well informed as to the movements of her step-mother. She speculated and wondered and puzzled herself a good deal about these frequent outings; and finding Clarissa singularly reticent upon the subject, grew daily more curious and suspicious, until at last she could endure the burden of this perplexity no longer without some relief in words, and was fain to take the judicious Warman into her confidence.

"Has Mrs. Granger been out again this afternoon, Warman?" she asked, one evening, when the handmaiden was dressing her hair for dinner.

"Yes, miss. The carriage came home just now. I heard it. Mrs. Granger went out almost directly after you did."

"I wonder she can care to waste so much time in calls," said Sophia.

"Yes, miss, it is odd; and almost always the same place, too, as you may say. But I suppose Mrs. Granger was intimate with Mr. and Mrs. Austin before her marriage."

"Mr. and Mrs. Austin! What do you mean, Warman?"

"Lor', miss, I thought you would know where she went, as a matter of course. It seems only natural you should. I've heard Jarvis mention it at supper. Jarvis has his meals at our table, you know, miss. 'We've been to the Rue du Cavalier Barnard again to-day,' he says, 'which I suppose is French for Barnard's Inn. Missus and them Austins must be very thick.' Jarvis has no manners, you know, miss; and that's just his uncultivated way of speaking. But from what I've heard him remark, I'm sure Mrs. Granger goes to call upon the Austins as much as three times a week, and seldom stops less than an hour."

A deadly coldness had crept over Sophia

Granger—a cold, blank feeling, which had never come upon her until that moment. He had a wife, then, that dashing young painter with the brilliant brown eyes—the only man who had ever aroused the faintest interest in her well-regulated soul. He was married, and any vague day-dream with which she had interwoven his image was the merest delusion and phantasmagoria. She was unspeakably angry with herself for this unworthy weakness. A painter, a person paid by her father, something less than a curate—if it was possible for any creature to seem less than Mr. Tillott in Sophia's estimation. He was a married man—a base impostor, who had sailed under false colors—a very pirate. All those graceful, airy compliments, those delicate attentions, which had exercised such a subtle influence over her narrow mind—had, indeed, awakened in her something that was almost sentiment—were worse than meaningless, were the wiles of an adventurer trading on her folly.

"He wanted to paint papa's picture," she thought, "and I suppose he fancied my influence might help him."

But what of Clarissa's visits to the painter's lodgings? What possible reason could she have for going there? Miss Granger's suspicions were shapeless and intangible as yet, but she did suspect. More than once—many times, in fact—during the painting of the portrait she had seen, or had imagined she could see, signs and tokens of a closer intimacy between the painter and her father's wife than was warranted by their ostensible acquaintance. The circumstances were slight enough in themselves, but these fragile links, welded together, made a chain which would have been good enough evidence in a criminal court, skillfully handled by an Old Bailey lawyer. Sophia Granger racked her brains to account for this suspected intimacy. When and where had these two been friends, lovers perhaps? Mr. Austin had been away from England for many years, if his own statement were to be believed. It must have been abroad, therefore, that Clarissa had known him—in her school-days. He had been drawing-master, perhaps, in the seminary at Belforêt. What more likely?

Miss Granger cherished the peculiar British idea of all foreign schools, that they were more or less sinks of iniquity. A flirtation between drawing-master and pupil would be a small thing in such a pernicious atmosphere. Even amidst the Arcadian innocence of native academies such weeds have flourished. This flirtation, springing up in foreign soil, would be, of course, ten times more desperate, secret—Jesuitical, in fact—than any purely English product.

Yes, Miss Granger decided at the end of every silent debate in which she argued this question with herself—yes, that was the word of the enigma. These two had been lovers in the days that were gone; and meeting again, both married, they were more than half lovers still.

Clarissa made some excuse to see her old admirer frequently. She was taking lessons in painting, perhaps—Miss Granger observed that she painted more than usual lately—merely for the sake of seeing him.

And how about George Fairfax? Well, that flirtation, of course, was of later date, and a less serious affair. Jealousy—a new kind of jealousy, more bitter even than that which she had felt when Clarissa came between her and her father—sharpened Miss Granger's suspicions in this case. She was jealous even of that supposed flirtation at Belforêt four or five years ago. She was angry with Clarissa for having once possessed this man's heart; ready to suspect her of any baseness in the past, any treason in the present.

The Grangers were at Madame Caballero's two or three evenings after this revelation of Warman's, and Sophia had an opportunity of gleaning some scraps of information from the good-natured little lion-huntress. Madame had been asking her if Mr. Austin's portraits had been a success.

"Yes; papa thinks they are excellent, and talks about having them exhibited in the salon. Mr. Austin is really very clever. Do you know, I was not aware that he was married till the other day?" Sophia added, with a careless air.

"Indeed! Yes, there is a wife, I understand; but she never goes into society; no one hears of her. For my part, I think him charming."

"Has he been long in Paris?"

Madame Caballero shrugged her shoulders. "I don't know," she said. "I have only known of his existence since he became famous—in a small way—a very small way, of course. He exhibited some military sketches, which attracted the attention of a friend of mine, who talked to me about him. I said at once, 'Bring him here. I can appreciate every order of genius, from Ary Scheffer to Gavarni.' The young man came, and I was delighted with him. I admitted him among my intimates; and he insisted on painting the picture which your papa was good enough to admire."

"Do you know how he lived before he came into notice—if he has ever been a drawing-master, for instance?"

"I know that he has given lessons. I have heard him complain of the drudgery of teaching."

This sustained Miss Granger's theory. It seemed so likely. No other hypothesis presented itself to her mind.

Day by day she watched and waited and speculated, hearing of all Clarissa's movements from the obsequious Warman, who took care to question Mrs. Granger's coachman in the course of conversation, in a pleasant casual manner, as to the places to which he had taken his mistress. She waited and made no sign. There was treason going on. The climax and explosion would come in good time.

In the mean while Clarissa seemed almost entirely free. Mr. Granger, after living for nearly fifty years of his life utterly unaffected by feminine influence, was not a man to hang upon his wife's footsteps or to hold her bound to his side. If she had returned his affection with equal measure—if that sympathy for which he sighed in secret could have arisen between them—he might have been as devoted a slave as love could make an honest man. As it was, his married life at its best was a disappointment. Only in the fond hopes and airy visions which his son had inspired did he find the happiness he had dreamed of when he first tried to win Clarissa for his wife. Here alone, in his love for his child, was there a pure and perfect joy. All other dreams ended in bitter waking. His wife had never loved him, never would love him. She was grateful for his affection, obedient, submissive; her grace and beauty gave him a reflected lustre in society. She was a creature to be proud of, and he was proud of her; but she did not love him. And with this thought there came always a sudden agony of jealousy. If not him, what other had she loved? Whose image reigned in the heart so closely shut against him? Who was that man, the mere memory of whom was more to her than the whole sum of her husband's devotion?

[TO BE CONTINUED NEXT WEEK.]

OLD LETTERS.

YOUNG persons frequently start in life with an impression that in future years they will be glad to refer frequently to the records of the past. With this laudable design they write diaries, and keep all letters addressed to them. The diary, which is simply a letter unaddressed, or addressed to one's self at a distance of a few years, is naturally subject to the same conditions as the letter of the more ordinary type. Perhaps a few people still keep diaries of the old religious type, devoted to the record of their spiritual development. The diary, however, which deals with external facts is rapidly becoming an extinct variety of literature. We have not the necessary time or patience, and we are content to refer to files of newspapers, to annual registers, or to some similar records for all the facts which we desire to know. Many persons, however, still preserve piles of letters which are intended to discharge the same function. They carefully indorse them, tie them up in neat bundles, and consign them to some safe hiding-place, to which, as they vaguely imagine, it will be interesting to look back at some future period. Now so long as letters were really models of composition, or might possibly aspire to that rank, there was a sufficient motive for doing this. The letters had an intrinsic value of their own; and it would have been a serious loss to literature if many of the collections which have been published had been ruthlessly destroyed as soon as received. But the propriety of preserving letters must now be judged upon different grounds. Laying aside the business letters, which are necessarily preserved, and those increasingly rare specimens which occasionally possess some share of the old merit, is it not better to destroy the ordinary rank and file of our correspondence? Considered as mere raw material for future history, they are, generally speaking, superfluous. The danger to history of all kinds at the present day is less in the scarcity than in the superabundance of materials.

Few people, moreover, when they set about preserving letters, have an eye to the possible biographer of the future. They think only of their own gratification, and say to themselves, How pleasant it will be when we are old to turn back to records of past friendships or of early triumphs and disappointments! They put themselves in the attitude of the lotus eaters, dreaming and living again in memory with the old faces of their infancy. Such persons would do well to ask themselves one or two questions. It is probably true that in later years it is very pleasant at times to picture the scenes and the events with which we have ceased to be familiar. A man must be unhappily constituted who does not occasionly fall into the frame of mind expressed in Gray's Ode, and indulge in a pleasing regret at the thought of the playing fields and the antique towers. We think what fine, ingenuous lads we once were; how we enjoyed our sports and our studies; with what ardor we yearned for the days before us and the tumult of real life. What pleasant times, too we enjoyed when we first fancied ourselves men, and thought that the eyes of the whole country were fixed upon the class-lists at the colleges! We can even persuade ourselves that there was nothing but enjoyment in the time of our first love-making, or of our entrance into a profession. Such dreams of our old days are doubtless delightful, and it may be well to provide ourselves with the materials for exciting them. But there is a serious objection to the particular scheme of preserving letters. It always seems as if the pleasant letters were lost, and the dull ones preserved. If we ever do turn to our old correspondence, instead of leaving it in the dust of an ancient drawer, which is perhaps the ordinary result, our impression on turning over the authentic records is that we were stupider and duller than we could have possibly conceived. These letters, that should preserve the buoyant spirits of childhood or the sanguine anticipations of youth, are matter-of-fact scrawls, with a great deal about money, with much absurd grumbling over trifling evils, and with very little sentiment of any kind. Is it that lovers do not know how to put their best feelings into writing, or is it that, after all, the pleasantness of such retrospects depends chiefly upon a common illusion? We suspect that both reasons are applicable. Most letters, at any rate in these latter days, are very dry and stupid, and require to be supplemented by fresh recollections of the circumstances in order to make them tolerable; and, moreover, the supposed happiness of youth is in very great measure—though we need not ask how far—a popular superstition. Probably no greater shock could be given to most of us than if we could live over again one or two of those days which are colored so attractively by the mere lapse of time. So far as reading letters enables us to perform that feat, they had generally better be burned; and so far as they are extremely dull records even of the stupid things they commemorate, the case is still stronger.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

L. T. H.—Three yards of ladies' cloth are required for a sacque and cape. We can not tell you the number of yards of passementerie, as we do not know how you will trim it. Twilled silk neck-ties are most worn. Lace bows, either white or black, are worn at the throat over the colored tie.

GLENN.—A Marguerite polonaise and flounced skirt is the style for velvet walking suits. Fur bands or bead passementerie with lace or fringe are the trimmings. The skirt is faced with crinoline, and about two inches of the velvet should be turned up on the facing without a binding of braid.

A. M. B.—Make your little girl's velveteen wrap a simple loose sacque, and trim with a bias gros grain band. We would not advise swan's-down for trimming. The brown plush should also be a sacque. For trimming cut the edge in Gothic points, and finish with narrow fringe.

M. H.—For your short upper skirt make a wide apron front, with plain back breadths very bouffant.—Read the article on gold-fish in a former number of the Bazar.

MRS. J. M. Z.—Fur trimmings are very stylish, but are expensive, and can only be worn in the depth of winter. A single narrow band is more stylish than two bands or one broad band. If you trim your faille with velvet, you can wear it the greater part of the year in this climate.

JENNIE.—Cloaks are most worn.—We know nothing of the nostrums advertised for curling hair.

EVANGELINE.—A black cashmere polonaise will be handsome over your poplin dress. White muslin over dresses are worn over high-necked silks.

MRS. L. A. C.—Cut your sacque a loose medium long sacque, and make a large talma cape of new cloth to wear over it.—We believe white blonde lace can not be cleaned.

HORTENSE.—Read about white tulle dresses in the present number of the Bazar.

MRS. G.—A simple Gabrielle reaching to the ankle, and braided with the same color, is the design for your little child's dress.

SUBLIMITY.—Make your velvet wrap by cut paper pattern of Watteau Mantle, illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. IV. Trim with gimp and fringe. A suit of black satine at $1 a yard made by pattern of House Dress shown in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV., and worn with your velvet wrap or a shawl or sacque, is what you want.—Remove the knife and fork from your plate when passing it at table. Take your husband's arm always in the street; that of an acquaintance in the evening only.

MILDRED ASKELL.—Make your beautiful silver poplin by cut paper pattern of Worth-Basque House Dress, illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Trim with one deep flounce (instead of the narrow ones shown in the picture) and with velvet and fringe of the same shade.

N. W. AND C. K.—Read answer above to "Sublimity."

M. W. S.—Gore your silk skirt at the sides and in front, and make a postilion attached to a belt of the scraps. This will give your plain waist a more modern look. Cut the sleeves coat shape.

AN ADMIRER.—We know of nothing that will make straight hair curl so well as the old-fashioned plan of rolling it on paper.

LOU.—Put bias bands of trimming velours on the skirt of your velveteen, and cut the edge of the over-skirt in Gothic points. A Watteau mantle or a sacque with a cape would be stylish for a tall, slim girl.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—Make your black silk suit with over-skirt and basque, and add a cashmere or velvet mantle. Fur is the most stylish trimming for mid-winter, but lace and fringe can be worn at all seasons.

AGNES.—It would require a column of the Bazar to answer all your questions about a trousseau. You will find much of the information you want in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 49, Vol. IV.

MRS. MCAWBER.—The "Ugly Girl" articles are found in Bazar, Vol. III., Nos. 26, 30, 33, 38, and 43; and Vol. IV., Nos. 5, 22, and 35. They will give you the necessary information respecting cosmetics. Tea and coffee are generally considered injurious to the complexion, though this depends somewhat on the individual constitution.

PHILIP.—We think you would find it difficult to learn to color photographs well without some instruction.

H. M. T.—Your ancient cook-book is interesting as a curiosity of literature, but the march of improvement has probably left it behind, and there would be no reason for republishing it at the present time.

VIOLET.—The wish to become an authoress is a very common thing; the capacity to do so is quite a different matter. Literature, like every other profession, demands severe training and long experience; and you have no more right to expect to succeed therein at the first stroke of the pen than you would to practice law without having made any preparatory studies. The stories of inexperienced young girls who rise suddenly from the depths of despair to the heights of literary fame have little foundation except in the imagination of the writers; and the exceptions to this rule are too few to be taken into account. If your MSS. have been returned by publishers, it has probably been because they were crude and wanting in interest; and the only advice we can give you is to profit by the experience, and study to improve thereby.

CARLOTTA.—You can obtain new books on the various branches of art at stores for the sale of artists' materials. The principal of the free school for painting and sculpture at the Cooper Union will doubtless give you the suggestions you require, and for which we have not room.

PLAYWRIGHT.—Your questions are too personal to be answered here.

SUBSCRIBER.—It is asking too much to expect us to rehearse the stories of Damon and Pythias and Una and the Lion for your individual benefit, and we must refer you to classical history for one, and to Spenser's "Faërie Queen" for the other. China was known as Cathay in olden times.

READER AND ADMIRER.—A decoction of larkspur will destroy vermin.

UNCLE JAKE.—We should say that the line between apple juice and cider might be drawn where the process of fermentation begins.

PARIS GOSSIP.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THOSE DREADFUL AMERICANS.

I HEARD the words spoken in a vehement tone of annoyance, a few days ago, as I was entering a milliner's rooms, and without stopping to ask what had provoked the exclamation, I resented it. I have several pleasant acquaintances, and a few dear and valued friends, among the Americans, and it stung me like a personal insult to hear them stamped wholesale with the uncomplimentary adjective, and the still more uncomplimentary little pronoun that has such an amount of spite and disrespect shut up in its five letters. I did not venture to challenge the speaker there and then to explain herself, but as a milliner's room is a sort of neutral ground, where civilized human beings may address each other without having been introduced, and not be snubbed for the impertinence, I volunteered some inoffensive remark about bonnets in general as a preliminary to conversation.

"They are more fantastic than ever this season," I said; "though one would have expected that the horrors which the Parisians have passed through might have had a sobering effect even on bonnets; but the odd thing of all is that the smaller they grow in size, the bigger they grow in price."

Nothing could have been more to the point than this random shot.

"That is precisely what I have been saying," replied the lady, quickly, in a very irate tone; "and it is all the fault of those horrid Americans. They flock over here with millions of money, and make a raid on the milliners, and don't care what they pay; and the consequence is that we, who can't compete with them, are driven either to buy hideous bonnets in open shops on the street at a moderate price, or to pay an unconscionable sum for a proper one out of a good house. And then the milliner coolly tells you that she doesn't care for your custom any more, now that she has got an American clientèle. I wish to mercy they would stay at home and buy their clothes in America, and not come here to make life impossible to every body but millionaires!"

There was such a vigorous show of justice in all this that I was cowed out of my angry resolve to protest. There is no denying the effect of American customers in the Paris dress market, and if my French fellow-creature knew nothing more of them than this, her indignation was fairly legitimate. I could not let it go, however, without a faint attempt at a defense; so I humbly observed that there was something to be said about the rapacity and want of conscience of milliners and others who traded so shamefully on the ignorance of their transatlantic customers, who, accustomed to the exorbitant figures of the New York and Boston stores, find the highest prices in Paris comparatively moderate in comparison.

"Tut!—nonsense," replied my companion, contemptuously. "What were milliners made for but to trade on the ignorance and vanity of women all over the world? and why are women so vain and ignorant as to let themselves be traded on? Why don't American ladies take the trouble to find out, when they come over here, what is the maximum that society allows a sane woman to pay for a gown or a bonnet, and then insist on having the same article supplied to her at the same price? But no; they are too lazy to inquire at all about it, and they are so rich that it doesn't matter a straw to them what price they pay. In fact, the dress-makers tell you they never admire a dress unless it costs a fabulous amount of money. The fournisseurs know this, and the moment an American customer appears on the scene, up go the prices. Of late years they have been so constantly in the habit of raising them that the best houses have now adopted the American standard permanently, and though it has lost them the greater part of their home custom, they find it pays. One American is as good as three Frenchwomen to any dress-maker; and the upshot of this to us is, either that we must follow suit or make our own clothes. Remonstrances are useless; their American customers are the only ones they care for."

At this point of the conversation one of the demoiselles of the establishment brought my companion her bill, receipted, and as this was what she had been waiting for, she wished me good-morning and went away, leaving me waiting patiently till the goddess of the place should have leisure to attend to me. In due time she did condescend so far, and came from an inner room rubbing her hands in that patronizing way peculiar to the Paris modiste, and hoping that I held myself well, and wanted a new bonnet—which indeed I did, sadly. I had been three years away from Paris, and had spent the last one in England, where I had clothed myself, as the deformity on my head sufficiently attested. I said I should like to try on a bonnet that struck me as likely to suit. It was in black lace—not real lace, but that silky imitation called dentelle de Paris, which is made especially for bonnets—and it had a handsome violet flower with a traînée of buds and leaves for ornament. The price, which, not being an American, I was mean enough to inquire beforehand, was eighty francs.

"Eighty francs!" I exclaimed. "Why, I never paid you more than fifty-five for a winter bonnet, and forty for a lace or tulle one. What is the meaning of your having increased so enormously?"

I shall not attempt to reproduce the brilliant volubility of Madame D—— as she explained, to her own complete satisfaction, how it was that, after three years' absence, I should return to find her in the same rooms (Boulevard des Capucines), paying the same rent, employing the same number of hands at an ante rate of wages and consumption. Just as there are two proprietors in the schools—one for the English and one for the French pupils.

An instance of this, the winter before last, a vague idea of going abroad to order an evening dress. I my position as poorer than she was, and hundred and fifty francs was a long price to pay for it; but as for style, pretty fit, and artistic effect, only they were to be as new as possible. I could make them do, and I thought, on the whole, I would be safe. Well, with a rare majestic calm I went to Worth's with the simplest dress for a young girl, white tulle with flounces thrown over it, and trimmed with clusters of white roses. But why should all the bankers of Europe be ostracised for their extravagance? For they are. In right of her extravagance? For they are. In right of her extravagance? For they are. In right of her

Silver Canvas and Crochet Lamp-chimney Cover simulating a Liberty-Cap.

To make this cover take a strip of silver canvas eleven stitches in width and of a length to suit the circumference of the lamp chimney for which it is designed (the number of stitches, however, must be divisible by 7). Leave an extra piece of canvas half an inch wide on one end of the strip. Close the strip in a ring, letting the ends overlap half an inch, and work the cross stitch embroidery with blue silk in the design shown by the illustration. Work button-hole stitches with blue saddler's silk on the upper edge of the strip. Next work the upper part, all of single crochet, with blue and white saddler's silk, always going forward, as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on each button-hole stitch loop of the upper edge; in doing this work alternately 6 st. (stitch) with blue silk, and 1 st. with white silk. In this, as well as in the remaining rounds, always work off the blue stitch before the white stitch with white silk, and each white stitch with blue silk. 2d–12th rounds.—Always alternately 6 blue, 1 white st. on the stitches of the same color in the preceding round. Work the 13th to 31st rounds in a similar manner; but in order to make the points, narrow 1 st. in every blue strip in the 13th, 19th, 23d, 27th, and 31st rounds. With that last round finish off the crocheted part in a point, and to the latter fasten a tassel of blue silk and steel beads. Line the lower part with a strip of canvas and a circular bottom of silk, and button-hole stitch the canvas parts together with blue silk on the under edge of the lamp-chimney cover.

Card-board and Silk Lamp Screen.

THIS screen is made of card-board, covered with green silk and edged with lace. It is mounted on a carved wood stand. Cut, first, a circular piece of card-board seven inches and a half in diameter, and on this transfer the design, one-third of which is given on Fig. 33, Supplement, having previously completed it in a circle. Puncture holes at regular intervals in the card-board along the dotted lines with a coarse needle, and cut out the card-board inside of the straight outlines. Cover both sides of the card-board with green silk, folding the edges of the material down on the inside and overhanding them together. The trimming on the outer edge consists of gathered black lace an inch wide and gathered white lace three-quarters of an inch wide; the seam made by sewing on the lace is covered with narrow gold braid. Fasten the screen, when finished, on the stand.

Court-plaster Case, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS case is made of card-board, covered on the inside with gray satin and on the outside with fine gray linen. The latter is ornamented in point Russe with saddler's silk of different colors. Cut one piece of card-board from Fig. 68, Supplement, and separate it into two parts along the double line given on Fig. 68. Cover each of these halves on the outside with fine gray linen, which is divided into half-inch squares by drawing out three or four threads each way. These squares are ornamented in Smyrna stitch with colored saddler's silk, as shown by Fig. 2. Along the lines of the squares make rows of stitching with coarse black silk, and stitch these with white silk. Line the inside of the case, sewing in at the same time the four pieces of gray silk ribbon shown by Fig. 1, which hold the card-board together, and keep the court-plaster in place. Sew one end of each of these four ribbons to the points of the card-board pieces marked a, b, c, and d on Fig. 68, Supplement, in such a manner that this end comes between the card-board and lining. The free ends of the ribbons a and b are now fastened to the points marked e and f on the other half of the case, also between the card-board and lining. In doing this care must be taken that the ribbons lie smoothly on the piece of card-board on which they are stretched. In a similar manner fasten the free ends of the ribbons c and d to the points marked g and h on the first half of the card-board. Sew silk cord on the outer edge of each half of the case.

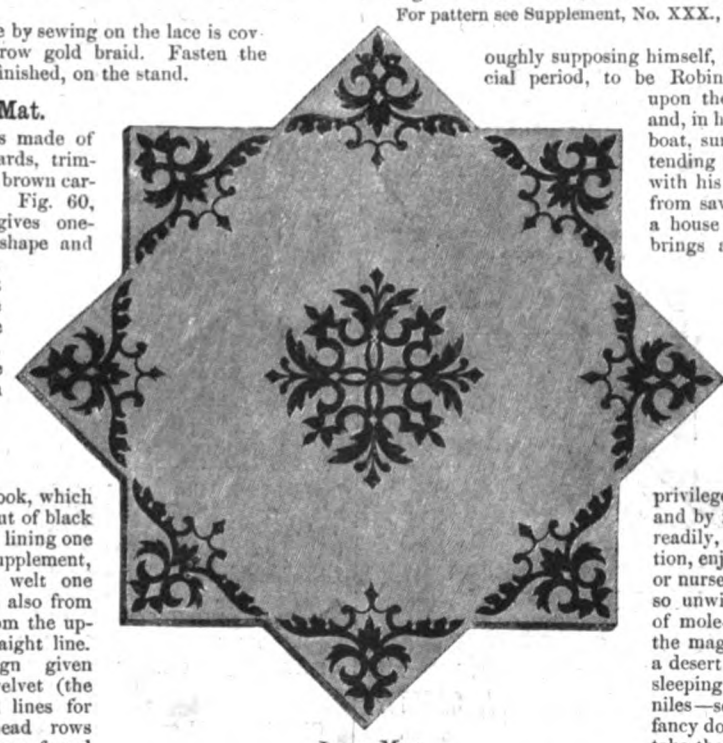
Lamp Mat.

THIS mat is made of cigar-box boards, trimmed with dark brown carriage leather. Fig. 60, Supplement, gives one-eighth part of the shape and the design of the mat. From this design cut the figures of carriage leather, and paste them on the mat. Line the mat on the under side with green flannel.



LAMP MAT.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XXIV., Fig. 60.

Embroidered Needle-Book.

FOR this needle-book, which simulates a sachel, cut of black velvet and white silk lining one piece from Fig. 34, Supplement, and for the pocket welt one piece of white velvet also from Fig. 34, but only from the upper edge to the straight line. Transfer the design given on Fig. 34 to the velvet (the dotted lines for the bead rows are transferred to both halves and to the piece of white velvet, but the design for the lower trimming only to that half which is intended for the front side). Work the embroidery with white silk and steel beads as shown by the illustration and indicated on the pattern. Baste the white velvet on the front half of the sachel at the corresponding point, sew on the beads, and work the desired initial, as shown by the illustration. On the inside of the needle-book sew several pieces of pinked flannel to suit the shape of the book, and furnish the latter with a handle of black velvet ribbon trimmed with steel beads, as shown by the illustration.

LAMP-CHIMNEY COVER SIMULATING A LIBERTY-CAP.

MOUNTAINS AND MOLE-HILLS.

THE power which an imaginative boy has of thoroughly supposing himself, for an especial period, to be Robinson Crusoe upon the desert island, in his hut or his boat, surrounded by his live stock, tending his crops, or making ready, with his man Friday, for an attack from savages, in the back parlor of a house in Bedford Square, I opine brings about one of the happiest frames of mind ever vouchsafed to mortals. It is only equaled, at any rate, by that of the little girl who, having put her doll to bed, entreats that her nurse shall tread lightly across the room, and speak with bated breath, lest the slumbers of the puppet should be disturbed. This privilege, then, I insist I still retain; and by its assistance I admit I can readily, and with but little provocation, enjoy in my chosen play-ground or nursery the process, usually held so unwise, of "making mountains of mole-hills." I do not aspire to the magnificence of a monarchy on a desert island, or the control of the sleeping arrangements of any juveniles—so my fancy does not take that turn—and I do not play at being De Foe's hero, or Anna Maria the head nurse. If I did, I believe and trust I should be equally capable of keeping up the illusion, as I hold I am of converting mole-hills into mountains.

EXAMPLE FOR THE LADIES.

MRS. MARY R. HUBBARD, Troy, N. Y., earned, with a Wheeler & Wilson, in 1868, $731 47; stitching 31,092 shirt-fronts, equal to 886,122 feet of seam. At 20 stitches to the inch, this would give 212,669,280 stitches, an average of 708,891 per day, 88,612 per hour, and 1477 per minute, or sixty times as fast as hand-sewing. Sixty years in one! Her machine has run three years by steam and three by foot-power without repair, and is as good as when bought.—[Com.]

'Favorite' Safety Pin.

PATENTED AUG. 29, 1871.
BEAUTY, ECONOMY, UTILITY, SAFETY.
The Best and Most Perfect Pin ever made.
It takes 22 inches of wire to construct one Pin. It overcomes objections constantly made by those using other pins. Unlike them, the wire is formed into a long and short spiral coil. The Pin is pointed at the end, and is of a triangular shape, which will allow it to easily penetrate one or more thicknesses of cloth. When confined, the sharp point is perfectly inclosed and secure, and can not become loosened except by hand manipulation. They give perfect satisfaction. Liberal inducements offered to the Trade. By H. L. STEPHENS.

This new novel is the success of the day. Its publication had to be delayed to fill booksellers' orders, and it continues to sell rapidly all the time. Every body is reading it!

From The Worcester [Mass.] Palladium.
"My Wife and I" is one of Mrs. Stowe's finest works. There is not a question of the times but what is introduced into these interesting chapters. The book will be in great demand.

From The Boston [Mass.] Journal.
Always bright, piquant, and entertaining, with an occasional touch of tenderness, strong because subtle; keen in sarcasm, full of womanly logic directed against unwomanly tendencies, Mrs. Stowe has achieved an undoubted success in this her latest effort. Aside from the interest of the plot, the book has the additional charm of a bright and brilliant essay; its sketches of character are graphic and lifelike, and its portrayal of society as it is to-day is most vivid and truthful.

We make only one style, and have but one price for our Pianos, which are all made from thoroughly seasoned and kiln-dried materials, and have seven octaves—rosewood case—carved legs and lyre—large square grand overstrung scale—front round corners—serpentine bottom—iron plate—French action—and are all warranted five years. We have no agents, and allow no commissions or discounts to any one. This explains how we can sell a good Piano for $290, which is about the price Piano dealers pay to manufacturers for instruments similar to ours. Piano dealers are allowed by all manufacturers, except ourselves, to add 100 per cent., and upward, profit to all sales. This the public can prove by investigation to be strictly true. Piano dealers, teachers, professors, and everybody else, are excluded from any and every possibility of a single cent of commission on our Pianos. If you wish a Piano sent for trial, you must make the matter of reference and payment unquestionable; and if the instrument is in any respect inferior to any Piano made in the known world at any price, you may send it back to us at the end of ten days' trial, instead of paying for it. If you order a Piano sent, we have one request to make; and that is, that the trial shall be made by parties who are not interested in other Pianos. Please send for our Circulars containing full particulars and references to bankers, merchants, and families, in thirty-five States and Territories, who are using our Pianos. Address or apply to the

BUTTON-HOLE WORKERS.

Patented June 27, 1871.

One of the most important inventions of the age!
The most perfect Button-Hole Worker ever invented!

So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes, and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction.

The most liberal inducements offered to the trade.

STEINWAY & SONS'

Grand, Square, and Upright Pianos

Were awarded the

FIRST GRAND GOLD MEDAL,

World's Fair, Paris, 1867, and London, 1862.

The Steinway Pianos are universally conceded to be

The Leading First-Class Piano

now before the public. These instruments are preferred to all others by the most celebrated pianists. They are used by all the principal concert troupes whenever attainable. They have a truly "world-wide" reputation, being largely exported to Europe and all parts of the civilized world, and they are sought to be imitated by nearly all American and European piano-makers.

Steinway & Sons' Mammoth Manufactory

is the most perfectly arranged and extensive establishment of its kind in the world. The published official revenue returns having revealed the fact that "the amount of their yearly sales exceed those of the twelve largest piano-makers of New York combined."

STEINWAY & SONS call special attention to their

with double Iron Frame, Patent Resonator, and Tubular Frame action, which are matchless in volume and quality of tone and surpassing facility of action, while standing longer in tune and being more impervious to atmospheric influences than any other piano at present manufactured.

Every Piano Warranted for Five Years.

Prices as low as the exclusive use of the best materials and most thorough workmanship will permit. Old Pianos taken in exchange.

BAZAR

Cut Paper Patterns,

For Ladies, Misses, Girls, and Children of Both Sexes.

The great design of the proprietors of the Bazar Patterns is to furnish cut paper patterns of every description, and for every size, at a moderate price. These patterns are intended to be the most perfect, the most practical, and the most economical ever produced in this country, and so arranged as to be easily understood by those not accustomed to making their own garments. We avoid as far as possible every form of extravagance in cutting up material, at the same time combining all that is desirable with fashion and good taste. Our business will be conducted in a spirit of progress. Every pattern we issue will be the product of the ablest and most experienced gentlemen dressmakers in the country, all under the supervision of Mr. Moschcowitz, a gentleman who stands at the head of his profession, and who is unquestionably the ablest dressmaker in the United States. What Worth is to Paris, Moschcowitz is to New York—the highest authority on all matters pertaining to fashion. We have carefully prepared a catalogue of 28 pages, containing over two hundred figures, showing the leading fashions of the day. From this catalogue may be selected patterns of every description and of every size, ranging from 30 to 46 inches bust measure; also for misses from 10 to 16 years of age, and for children of both sexes under 10. On receipt of postage stamp, the above catalogue will be sent to any address free of charge. In this catalogue will be found a list of two valuable premiums, both of which are offered to subscribers for Harper's Bazar. One subscriber will get at least one of these premiums, and we confidently assert that, for liberality and magnitude, the premiums offered to each and every new subscriber for the Bazar have no parallel, an offer in which thousands of families will be benefited, and will, we trust, be the means of adding much to the comfort and economy of every household. We are confident that this premium will be hailed with delight by every lady in the land. For terms to Agents, or for catalogues, address

Important to Ladies.—Read the following extraordinary offer: The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co. manufacture and warrant two different Sewing Machines, one called the Elliptic, the other called the Wheeler & Wilson. The Elliptic Machine excels in many important points. It is so light that a child can run it with ease; or an invalid, whose strength is sufficient to walk about the house or to do the work of a child ten years old, can sew all day without being overfatigued. It is impossible to convey by language a tithe of the merits belonging to this deservedly popular Machine. To see it perform the different operations, such as hemming, felling, gathering, embroidering, tucking, cording, frilling, quilting, fringing, etc., it seems more like a thing of life than a machine moved by the will of the operator. It has adjustable guages for every description of work, and can be changed in a moment to suit any material, coarse or fine. The economy of the Elliptic Machine in a family is almost incredible—with one, a good operator can do the work of twelve hands. A breadth of a skirt can be sewed in less than a minute; a gentleman's fine shirt can be made in three hours; or a child's dress, with many tiny pleats, in less time than the hands can fold them—in fact, every description of sewing is reduced from a question of hours to one of minutes. We make the following offer: Any person in the United States desiring one of these celebrated Machines can buy one and pay for it in work (not sewing) furnished at their own home. The work is pleasant and profitable, and can be accomplished by any lady, old or young. We send circulars on receipt of stamp. Address

FACETIÆ.

THE late Chicago fire completely destroyed the North Side, while much of the South and West sides remained unharmed. On last Sunday a Sabbath-school teacher was explaining to his class of youngsters the parable of the wise and foolish men who built their houses, one on the rock and the other on the sand, and went on to ask which was the foolish man, when a little Dutch boy shouted out, "The one that built on the North Side!"

Somebody proposes that bald-headed men have their monograms painted on the exposed spot.

It is not true that all the Germans in the late war returned home minus a leg and an arm, though it certainly is a fact that each soldier had only one arm and one leg left.

AMERICAN ENGINEERING.—In the course of an Illinois discussion a man is said to have "had a ravine built on the back of his head with a ginger-beer bottle."

Why does a man with a situation in his eye look like a fool?—Because he is gazing at vacancy.

A SERVANT OF HALL WORK—A hall porter.

A GENUINE RING FENCE—A hearty "ha-ha!"

PETITION AND REPETITION.

IMAGINE THE CONSTERNATION OF JULIA AND ALGERNON (WHO BELIEVED THEIR ATTACHMENT WAS UNNOTICED) WHEN THEY FOUND LAURA AND EMILY REPEATING THE WHOLE OF THE TENDER SCENE WHICH OCCURRED ON ALGY'S ASKING FOR HIS JULIA'S HAND!

A distinguished ex-Governor of Ohio, noted for story-telling, relates that on one occasion, while addressing a temperance meeting at Georgetown, District of Columbia, and depicting the misery caused by indulging too freely in the flowing bowl, his attention was attracted by the sobs of a disconsolate and seedy-looking individual in the rear part of the room. On going to the person and interrogating him, he was told the usual tale of woe: among other sad incidents, that, during his career of vice, he had buried three wives. The Governor, having buried a few wives of his own, sympathized deeply with the inebriate, and consoled him as much as was in his power. Said he, "Misfortune has afflicted you."

The mourner sobbingly replied, "Yes, yes, he has;" and, pausing a moment and wiping his nose, he continued, "but I don't think misfortune got much ahead of me; for as fast as he took one away, I took another."

SPLIT PEASE.—If the corn a country produces is so necessary to its existence, surely its pulse should be of vital importance too!

An impertinent minx asking her aunt the other day why she had left off her corsets, the old lady instantly replied that she did so because she had no time to waste in stays.

LAMENTABLE RESULT OF THE ADVENT OF THE GRAND DUKE ALEXIS.

ALL THE YOUNG LADIES' HEADS TURNED!

A young orator recently gave the following fine burst of frenzy from out of his confined soul, or bosom, or stomach, or wherever these things come from: "Yes, my friends, the mind of man is so expansive that it can soar from star to star, and from satchelite to satchelite, and from seraphene to seraphene, and from cherrybeam to cherrybeam, and from thence to the centre of the doom of heaven. To describe the mind of man would be like grasping at the stars and sticking in the mud. Could I place one foot on the sea and the other on—ahem—on the Georgium Sidus—ahem, ahem—yet to describe the mind of man, I'd howl round this little world—and, er—I'd—" He choked at the next big word, forgot the rest, and down he came a-howling.

MATRIMONY.—An affectionate wife, whose husband is but too often inebriated, says he is like the money market: the more tight he gets, the dearer he becomes.

Nothing so much destroys our peace of mind as to hear another express an intention to give us a piece of his.

A VENERABLE PILE—A worn-out Turkey carpet.

Whither should young ladies who pencil their eyebrows be dispatched?—To Pennsyl-va(l)n-ia.

A HINT TO MOTHERS.—Treat your babies kindly, but not cordial-ly.

"Though lost to sight, to memory dear," as the man said when he paid his dinner bill.

THE HONEST TRUTH.

AUNT. "And so, Tom, you are learning Music among other things. How do you like it?"

TOM. "I Hate it!"

AUNT. "Indeed! Which of your Studies do you prefer?"

TOM. "Oh, well, Music!"

THE CALENDAR CLARIFIED.

January was originally called Ginuary, because taken warm within to counteract cold without.

February was anciently styled Fibuary, on account of the lovers' perjuries uttered on Valentine's-day.

March took its name from the fact that it drills us into holes with piercing east wind.

April owes its denomination to the Saxon words ape and rill, because during this month it rains cats and dogs and monkeys.

May may have been called May mainly because May-day may fall mayhap on the first of the month.

June is so named because it comes after the first five months of the year, and is, therefore, June-ior to them.

July is duly denominated July, because you will see the heavy djew lie on the grass during the month.

August is superlatively entitled to this nomenclature, because, though all the other months may possibly be very Aug (whatever that means), this is the August of the lot. (This was an aug-ward question to settle.)

September was originally written Sup-tember, because the evenings begin to draw in about the hour at which people indulge in the pleasant but unwholesome meal known as supper.

October is derived from the German, and is so named because it is the month in which the English brew beer and the Germans make 'ock.

November is, as we know, called No-vember for no reason in particular.

December owes to Christmas bills the name it derives: from the "d'e" in which paterfamilias indulges as the small accounts file in.

TIME ON THE JUMP—Leap-year.

SIC VOS NON VOBIS.

AUCTIONEER. "Fifteen Hundred Dollars!—going at Fifteen Hundred Dollars! Any advance on Fifteen Hundred Dollars for this fine Portrait by Titian, painted in that Great Master's best manner!" (Hammer falls.)

BRUSH (to Badger). "Downright dishonest, I call it! Old Aaron's got Fifteen Hundred for that Titian, and he only gave me Fifteen for Painting it!"

LIVING UP TO EPITAPHS.

"That fellow's got in the wrong grave," said one gentleman to another in a cemetery.

"How so?"

"Because I knew him to be a forger and a thief, and yet look upon that epitaph!"

"Be careful," said the other, "how you speak, for none of us can live up to our epitaphs."

HOW TO MAKE COCK-SHOOT OYSTER SAUCE.—Take one go of weak gruel, heat in a saucepan, and add two raw oysters chopped small; garnish with a few blacks.

COMPARATIVELY WORSE OFF.—Fowls in England are occasionally afflicted with croup; "pigeons at Continental gaming-tables suffer from attacks of the croup-ier.

"I would rather have a spill presently than a-light just now," said that incorrigible wag, Jones, when the mare ran away.

Why are people who have nothing to be proud of but their pedigree like potatoes?—Because the only good belonging to them is underground.

A pipe of wine contains 150 gallons: 3 barrels make a pipe, and 24 pipes make an ordinary barrel-organ. Arrange your own tunes afterward, and turn the handle gently.

SEA-SIDE STUDIES.

DAUGHTER. "What make the sea get angry so often, mamma?"

MOTHER. "Because it is so full of crossed, my darling."

HOW TO KEEP AWAY CHOP.—Keep only very plain cooks.

An exchange says Tweed is a handsome man. We know he is a booty-ful man.

Both patterns are now ready, and will be sent, prepaid, by the Publishers, on receipt of Twenty-five cents each. For Complete List of Cut Paper Patterns published see Advertisement in last Number.*

☞ Our next Supplement Number, which will begin the New Volume, will contain a rich variety of Patterns, Illustrations, and Descriptions of Dolls' Bridal, Evening, Walking, and Peasant Costumes; Ladies' Mantles, Mantelets, Hats, and Bonnets; Fur Muffs, Collars, and Hats; Boys' and Girls' Suits; Fancy Articles for Holiday Gifts, etc., etc.

THE END OF THE YEAR.

IN concluding the Fourth Volume of Harper's Bazar with the present number, we may be permitted to embrace the opportunity of summing up the results thus far accomplished, and of giving our readers—all of whom we trust will accompany us throughout the New-Year—some idea of what they may expect in the future.

Four years ago we undertook the enterprise of creating a popular fashion journal of a high degree of excellence. This was a more difficult task than would appear at first sight. It was easy, no doubt, to make a useful fashion journal, but it was our aim to produce a work which should at once be an authority among persons of society, and a favorite with readers of literary culture and taste. There was a general impression that all fashion journals should be confined to the domain of ambitious housewives and sentimental school-girls; their place in literature was considered the same as that of cook-books; and they were held in contempt by the masculine gender universally, and by most intelligent women except for purposes of occasional reference. Is it too much to boast that the Bazar has changed all this? If it has not, it has fallen far short of its aim. It has endeavored to furnish a family journal of the highest tone and character—especially intended, indeed, for the better part of creation, and giving prominence to the mysteries of dress and the economy of the household, as subjects most closely connected with woman's life—but also presenting a choice and varied miscellany, in which all should find an interest, from the father of the family to the youngest child at the hearth.

At the end of four years, as we glance back upon the past, and venture to test our promises by performance, may we not appeal to our files as affording grateful proofs of success in the wealth and opportuneness of their illustrations, the chaste and elevated character of their literary columns, and the practical utility of their fashion and household departments? We refer with modest pride to the eminent names that, during the whole of this period, have adorned our list of contributors. It is certain that few journals can boast of so brilliant a combination of literary talent as is represented by such writers as GEORGE ELIOT, Miss MULOCK, Miss THACKERAY, Mrs. TROLLOPE, GAIL HAMILTON, HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, Miss BRADDON WILKIE COLLINS, Professor DE MILLE, JUSTIN M'CARTHY, ANNIE THOMAS, Mrs. LYNN LINTON, MARY PRESCOTT, MARY E. DODGE, and a variety of other celebrated authors both in Europe and America—not to speak of GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, whose weekly series of "Manners upon the Road" no fastidious scruples must prevent us from referring to as among the most exquisite specimens of essays on themes of social and current interest since the time of the Spectator. We only express our accordance with the highest critical judgments when we pronounce Mr. CURTIS, in richness of fancy, quaintness of invention and illustration, and elegance of style, the peer of ADDISON; while in vigor of intellect and depth of thought he may be deemed his superior without a compliment.

Indeed, all the serials, tales, and poems that have appeared in the Bazar have been of a distinguished order of literary merit; and arrangements have been made for the coming volume which will secure even greater attractions than before. The powerful story, "Blade-o'-Grass," in the costly eight-page Supplements which constitute our holiday gifts to our readers, calls to mind DICKENS in its mingled pathos and humor; this will be followed by other brilliant serials from celebrated writers; and many additional interesting features, which will be announced in due time, are in course of preparation.

While aiming at literary excellence, the Bazar has not forgotten to be useful. Its fashion illustrations are procured by special arrangement from abroad, and published simultaneously with their appearance in the Mode Illustrée, the Berlin Bazar, and other European journals. Its papers on New York fashions are compiled from personal examination of the toilettes and styles at the most fashionable dress-makers', milliners', and merchants'. Its pattern sheets contain, on an average, twenty full-sized patterns of all kinds of garments for ladies, gentlemen, and children, all of which, with the paper, are sold for the small sum of ten cents. To facilitate the transfer of patterns from this sheet, a cheap and ingenious tracing wheel has been devised, which a child can manage. And still further to accommodate our readers, we have organized a cut paper pattern department, for furnishing cut patterns of entire suits of the most popular dresses of the season, for the nominal sum of twenty-five cents each, or about one-eighth of what they would have cost at any pattern store before we devised this plan of supplying our patrons with cheap patterns. Due attention is also paid to household economy in all its branches.

We do not pretend to invent fashions. We only tell our readers what they are, and assure them that they may rely on what they find in our columns as being wholly accurate and disinterested. We have no private interests to serve, and no dress-making or commission establishments to keep up. Being satisfied that Paris and Berlin set the fashions for the world, we give our readers a faithful representation of those fashions at first hand. When imported dresses, bonnets, and fabrics cease to be sought after in preference to all others by our leaders of fashion, we shall change our policy, and economize at the same time, by illustrating American fashions at less cost. Thus far we have seen no good reason to do so.

Now, dear readers, we take leave of you, with best wishes for the New-Year, hoping to meet you all with the first number of our new volume.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of a Bugle Call.

MY DEAR GUSTAVUS,—I heard a horn the other day as I was walking in a quiet street, and the sound reminded me of another which I once heard elsewhere. It was a pleasant afternoon, and I was strolling about another city with that delightful feeling of travel of which I am always aware in a strange place. Standing for some time by a noble public building, which is upon a hill, and is approached by a series of terraces covered with shrubbery, I had been looking at the sunset, which was calm and beautiful, and, sensitive to every sight and sound, I walked slowly into a little park in which is a majestic statue. As I sauntered along the paths I heard the sound of a bugle. It was clear and rich and ringing, and seemed to me a cavalry call. I turned, expecting to see a troop of horse moving along the street; but as none appeared, I supposed that I must be near a drill-ground, and that the cavalry were practicing.

Again the clear notes rang upon the quiet air. They had a lingering fall, and it seemed to me that there was peculiar pathos in the sound. It is the call to bivouac, I said to myself; it is the vespers of the camp; and in the secret sadness of the sound is reflected the pensive yearning of the soldier's heart for home. In fancy I saw the camp upon the field, the motley figures gathered about the tents, the smoke of the evening fires, the laugh of loiterers, and the merry song; and later the musing, meditative groups of officers who smoked, silent, by the fire and thought of faces and forms that they did not see. Still, as I walked, I heard the bugle call once more. Was I, then, mistaken? and was there not a proud summons in the sound? Was this indeed the charge? If I listened, should I hear the heavy, swift gallop, the silent rush of squadrons? Again I saw a sadder scene. It was Sir Philip Sidney and his troop charging the Spaniards in that misty morning upon the Isel, three hundred years ago. It was the last desperate charge at Waterloo—the baffled charge in which the glory of Napoleon was quenched. Sadder and nearer still: it was the cruel charge from which horses that bore into the battle loved and noble youth came madly rushing back, and riderless.

So, as I walked, the bugle played upon my fancy. The unseen, unconscious master touched the various stops of a musing mind; and as picture melted into picture, and thought blended with thought, there remained at last only a vague feeling like that which inspired the song,

> "Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
> And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying."

I had reached the gate of the park, and as I passed out a man turned the corner of the street opposite, carrying a pail of oysters in one hand, and a bugle in the other. Raising it to his lips, he blew Sir Philip Sidney's charge, the reveille of the camp, and the soldiers' vespers—the spell of memory and sadness. It was a peddler of oysters blowing a horn.

I do not remember whether I smiled or not; but I know that my impulse was not to dash over and seize him by the throat as a swindler, but to thank him for the magic of his strain. I watched him while the notes were dying, dying, dying, and he peered curiously about to see if any cook appeared at any door, or any urchin with a tin kettle was ready for a bargain. Perhaps I ought to have thanked him in some other way than by staring at him, probably with a smile, until he disappeared. But after he had turned out of sight I still heard his bugle call, clear and sweet and sad—announcing fresh oysters.

As I went back to my lodgings, you will properly suppose that I duly meditated the little incident. It was a revelation in many ways. There are so many of our fellow-travelers who are blowing such pensive and prolonged music upon bugles that I found myself pertinaciously asking whether it was only to advertise fresh oysters. In the very city where I heard my peddler you may see a traveler upon our great journey who causes every body to turn and look at him in the street because he is so elaborately respectable. When I first saw him, clad in a noble suit of dark clothes, carrying a solid, shining cane with a gold head, with cambric ruffles on his bulging shirt bosom, and spotless shoes upon his feet, I remarked not only these impressive facts, but an air of meditative gravity and a dignified movement which filled my mind with interest and respect. This, I said, is some person of immeasurable dignity; some statesman, embassador, or magistrate. If it had been in Washington, I should have been sure that he could be nothing less than the Chief Justice of the United States—or, haply, the very Chief Magistrate himself. Or, possibly, in that city he would have seemed to me to be the dean of the diplomatic corps; the honorary father of the family of ministers; the uncle, so to speak, of wild attachés and secretaries of legation. Indeed, such prodigious deportment could not have seemed to me in the capital of the country less than that of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, which seems to me, upon the whole, the most mouth-filling and impressive of official titles.

I met him regularly at a certain hour of the afternoon, and the thought of meeting him and of contemplating such complacent dignity gradually fascinated me, and drew me out daily at the same hour. I found myself thinking of him respectfully as "the personage." Person, or man, or some one, were derogatory to the idea of him. He could not, I was sure, be adequately described by any word of less than three syllables—plenipotentiary was the most probable. He was certainly not a monosyllabic man. At length I came to feel a kind of acquaintance, such as we have all recently had with the Grand Duke Alexis. I thought he beamed at me loftily with an air of condescending recognition; and one day as I passed the personage I ventured to raise my hat with distant courtesy. Instantly he returned my salute, but with the utmost deliberation of solemn suavity. I thought that Webster, in his full oratorical suit of blue and buff, and in the midst of some Senatorial discourse, might so have acknowledged a pinch of snuff from a fellow-Senator. I felt very much more important after that recognition, and I beamed loftily in much the same way, and, of course, involuntarily, upon the boot-blacks who solicited my honor's patronage.

The mystery became very interesting, like the bugle call that I heard in the park; and one day as I was walking with a friend we passed the personage, and after I had saluted him, with pride and gratitude that my grandfather's grandchild was privileged to exchange salutations with the great ones of the earth, I said to my friend, respectfully, "Is that the Spanish Embassador, or the German Imperial Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary?" My friend replied, briefly: "What! that big man who just passed? Why, that's Tom Toad, the clerk of the fish market." Mr. Toad, you see, was a skillful player upon the bugle. His lordly strain seemed to announce jousts and tournaments of heroes and the approving eyes of Queens of Beauty. He played the vespers of the camp—the charge—the recall. But it was only to advertise oysters.

I am writing to you on Sunday night, Gustavus, for I am apt to begin my seventh day, or first day, with the sunset of Saturday, so you will absolve me from reproach. And I have been thinking whether I have not heard that bugle call of the oyster peddler in the pulpit of Saint Rainbow to-day. The rector exchanged with that clerical brother of his, who is not much liked in our parish. But the appearance of the worthy man inspires immense expectation. The surplice is so very precise, and his head and features and expression are all so harmonious with its precision, and the manner in which he spreads his handkerchief for his preliminary devotions, and the indescribable ecclesiastical benignity with which he calls us all miserable sinners, and his whole manner and method are so full of weight and dignity, that we settle ourselves to the sermon as if now the depths were to be sounded, and the heights scaled, and divine truth incontrovertibly asserted. But the sermon is nothing but fresh oysters. All that prodigious preparation and suggestion of eloquence and knowledge and solidity end in thin commonplace and sanctimonious twaddle. He is my "personage," my High Imperial Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary turning out to be clerk of the fish market. He is my peddler, blowing passionate romance and the charge at Waterloo upon his bugle as an oyster cry. I wish his oysters were as fresh.

I wish, also, that I felt quite sure that a church building itself that I could name were not the same misleading strain. You think probably that it is a fine Gothic structure of carved stone, and your imagination is enthralled by its enduring grace and beauty. The front is so, I believe. The façade is truly wrought stone, arched, foliated. But the sides are plain walls of plastered brick, because they are not seen, and the light and airy tracery of the towers is pine wood. You think that it is a stone cathedral, as I thought that I heard the vespers of the camp. But it is not a stone cathedral, as it was not vespers. It is oysters. There is a fine flourish, as in the preliminary notes of the worthy preacher to-day. But it is a flourish that ends ludicrously. One of the best of men said to me, as we walked home this morning, that he understood what that fine and subtle wit meant who said, after hearing a certain oratorical son of thunder, "My ears are full of bass drum, and my belly of water-melon."

But he had his improvement, Gustavus, and so will I have mine. I have remarked your manner when you meet indifferent persons. It is so gushing, so enthusiastic, so unstinted in expression, that I say to myself, "This is his heart's friend and brother." It promises the highest confidence and the truest sympathy. It is a gracious and beautiful manner, and I fear that sometimes a young girl's heart may have fluttered, and some poor applicant's hope have been revived in all its ardor, and their minds have been filled with visions, as mine was when I heard that pensive bugle call. But your manner does not mean that. All the warmth and suggestiveness mean nothing but how do you do. Now why should oyster peddlers blow the recall, with all its sad and passionate associations, as a cry of fresh oysters? And why should you greet every zany as Romeo greeted Juliet, merely to say how are you? Why should a Christmas carol be played at midnight under the window as a signal to the cook to bring out the kitchen scrapings? If we have oysters to peddle, it is an honest trade, and honest men live by it: but let us honestly cry "Oysters! oysters!" and not sing the Ranz des Vaches or the Marseillaise. Yours, dear boy,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE MARGUERITE VEST-POLONAISE.

THE Marguerite vest-polonaise illustrated on page 829 is a stylish over dress for house and street costumes of silk or woolen goods. The vest is shorter than that of the Louis XIV. polonaise; the sleeves are the fashionable ball-shape, with trimming up the outer seam in duchesse style; and the back has the Marguerite drapery, caught up by but two bows instead of three. Many dressy cashmere suits and silks of solid color are made by this design. It is also a pretty style for lustrous beaver mohair and alpaca dresses.

THE WATTEAU SACQUE AND CAPE.

Among the double capes, or sacques with cape, now so popular, the handsomest model yet introduced is that of which we give a cut paper pattern this week. At first these mantles had the Watteau fold on the cape, or else were merely an open cape and plain sacque. But the open cape is cold, and plain sacques are too tight over the tournure; and to obviate these objections the garment has been remodeled in the way we illustrate, giving the Watteau fold on the sacque for fullness over the tournure, and also for warmth, while the talma cape is permitted to fall open, gracefully displaying the trimmed Watteau fold. The length of the cape is a matter of taste, as many garments have capes but a finger-length shorter than the sacque.

This is the best design for a winter cloak that we have had since suits came into fashion. It is used for velvet, heavy cloth, especially black, olives, and dark green, and for the black cashmere flannel-lined wraps that are worn with any dress. It is also the stylish wrapping for suits of colored satines, cashmere, and ladies' cloth. Soutache interspersed with jet, passementerie, or silk bands on the cape and sacque, with fringe edging each, are the fashionable trimmings. A narrow band of black marten or other dark fur is also stylish on cloth or velvet cloaks.

The repped cashmere, called faille cashmere or Cicilienne, is much worn abroad for wraps and over dresses. A few garments of this soft, graceful fabric have been imported, but they are not highly appreciated, as the fabric is confounded with Irish poplin, which it resembles. The new camel's hair cloth, both brown and gray, is greatly sought after for mantles and polonaises. It can not be bought at present by the yard, but is imported in double capes richly wrought with soutache.

HOW TO LENGTHEN SHORT SKIRTS.

Modistes have devised a plan for lengthening the short skirts of street dresses, so that they may trail on the floor when worn in the house. Make the six-gored skirt of ordinary walking length—that is, just escaping the ground; cut the placket hole in the middle of the back; sew the three front breadths with slight gathers to the belt, and finish the belt with hooks and eyes, leaving the three back widths hanging then face the upper part of the back widths, and put in a drawing-string. When he skirt is to be worn in the street, draw the back breadths up to the belt: when it is required to train slightly in the house, let the fullness droop low over the tournure, and the over-skirt or polonaise will conceal the loose hanging breadths.

HOLIDAY GIFTS.

JEWELRY.

With the return of the holidays the jewelry palaces present an array of beautiful things for gifts. Among the choicest gifts this year are cameo pendants arranged to serve also as a brooch. These beautiful works of art are valuable enough to be kept as heir-looms. They are of pink sardonyx, dark jasper, or the bright green chrysoprase, artistically cut to represent historic characters, heads of famous beauties or else mythological subjects, and are mounted with pearls and diamonds. They cost from $.00 to $ 00. Fine Geneva paintings also ornament the universally worn locket. These are often incrusted with diamonds, and set in flowers of colored gold.

Necklaces are twisted rope chains, or else the cable chain, or large round links of pale Etruscan gold. Watch chains are the long open chains that pass around the neck, with a tassel end and a slide that answers for a brooch. Cameos and paintings are often put in these slides. The popular gold bracelet is a thick, heavy-looking band of Etruscan gold an inch wide, with light Greek ornamentation, or else a floral design in colored gold. Plain bands are $100; those much ornamented are from $.00 to $300 a pair. The gauntlet bracelets, three inches wide, shaped like a great cuff of gold, are not generally admired. Gentlemen's lockets are of stone cameo, or of onyx, with monogram: from $25 to $40. Crystal pendants with intaglio cutting, painted in the natural colors of flowers, are also fashionable for gentlemen.

In sets of jewelry those of gold are most popular for general wear, as they are appropriate for all occasions. The designs are copied from the antique, with yellow Etruscan gold for the base, ornamented with the red and green golds that are colored by acids. The handsomest sets, consisting of ear-rings and a brooch that will serve as a pendant also, cost from $75 to $100: $30 or $50 will buy a beautiful set of less elaborate work. Pale blue turquoises are probably the most popular stones, although only becoming to blondes. Of barbaric designs, set in Etruscan gold, very handsome turquoise sets cost $100; if associated with pearls, elaborate sets are $175 or $200. The pink coral sets, worn alike by dark and fair ladies, are preferred in balls, square blocks, and pear-shaped pendants, rather than in the carved floral designs. Coral cameos set with diamonds are also fashionable. The taste for artistic cameos increases, and many expensive sets are shown of these finely cut stones, enlivened by settings of colored gold studded with pearls, and having diamond pendants: $850 is asked for an exquisite set. Among the precious gems are dark sapphires and great square emeralds, lightened by settings of most brilliant diamonds. Sets of pearl have large rose-pearl centres, from which extend rays of gold, while below are swinging pendants of diamond and pearl. One set, not large, but of very fine pearls, is $3500. A lovely pendant from a necklace is a diamond shell in which rests a pink pearl of rare beauty: $725, gold, is the price. Necklaces are of two or three strands of strung pearls beautifully matched in size and color. Diamonds are not set heavily and in close clusters, but are placed far apart in light gold settings, to display the beauty of the stones. An exception to this is the ribbon necklace of diamonds, in which the stones are adjacent to each other without visible setting, and the necklace is made as flexible as a ribbon by means of springs underneath.

FANCY GOODS.

Fine enamel on gilt is a feature this season in many pretty ornaments for boudoirs and parlors. Rose tints, pale buff, and dark lapis blue enamel decorations are very beautiful on the pale fire gilt. Glove and handkerchief boxes with these ornamentations, and lined with pearl-colored satin, cost from $60 to $85. Artistically shaped inkstands, jewel-cases, vases that serve also for boudoir candlesticks, and low mantel clocks of antique pattern, with ornamental side pieces or candelabras, are lustrous with enamel in lovely pale tints to match the Pompadour furniture of salons and cozy boudoirs.

Table jardinières are new this year. They are small tables, that may be used as card receivers, or else as flower stands. One with porcelain mouldings is marked $150. Another, designed to be brought on the table with dessert, has a bright-colored bird in its midst, which, on touching a spring, warbles for an hour a precise imitation of the nightingale's song, with all its trills, chirps, and quavers. This ingenious table ornament costs $160, gold. A marqueterie table has three beautiful jars for flowers. For window jardinières are finely painted jars on ebony stands, mounted with gilt: price $200. Mantel vases have long, slender necks, with great globes below, made of glass colored to imitate onyx. Also for the mantel are a pair of Doric columns of marble, supporting classic heads in gilt or bronze. Épergnes entirely of crystal are light and tasteful centre-pieces for holding flowers or bonbons. Even the Egyptian pedestal that supports the dish is of glass without any silver. Small low troughs of glass for holding cut flowers ornament tables beautifully. They come in straight and in curved pieces, and may be formed into letters for mottoes or monograms, figures for dates, and many suggestive designs. A full set costs $10 or $12.

The fashionable chatelaines of solid silver remind one of gentlewomen of the olden time. A silver hook fastened to the belt has chains depending, to which are attached a silver horn for smelling-salts, a thimble, scissors, and pincushion: price $100. Simpler hooks of silver, with three pendent chains for vinaigrette, fan, and umbrella, are $14. The same article in gold, with but one chain for fan or parasol, is $45. New vinaigrettes, with ring and chain, are of English crystal, finely cut, and mounted with silver or gilt; they are double bottles for salts and perfume, and cost from $20 to $30; quite plain crystal vinaigrettes, without the chain, are $9; single bottles are $4.

The only novelty in fans are rococo mountings of imitation opals, turquoises, and garnets on tortoise-shell and yellow ivory sticks. They cost from $?0 upward

Bonbonnières for holding Christmas candy surpass in extravagance any thing shown for this purpose before. They are of painted porcelain, fine enamel and gilt, and of richly painted or embroidered satin and moiré. They cost sometimes $.00 or $?00. Lovely little bags of satin, painted with Cashmere figures, and fringed with gilt, are shown for holding a pound of French candies, and cost $6.

Black lisse (smooth) Russia leather, with solid silver mountings is the favorite leather for portemonnaies and card-cases.

TOYS.

Good little girls will discover that special attention is paid to dolly's toilettes this season. The shops are filled with bisque and wax dolls dressed in street suits and evening toilettes, bridal and bride-maids dresses, so perfect in every detail that they might serve as models for out-of-town dress makers. The special novelty however is the creeping doll, which, when wound up, will crawl twenty-five feet, turning its head and looking about in a weird way that makes grown people nervous, but delights the little folks: price $5. Small wax dolls, with natural curls are sold, undressed, for 50 cents. a doll dressed in a knitted wool dress that will not rumple or tear easily, with knitted parasol and hat in gray Berlin wool, is $1; a French toy for $1 25, is a crying baby in a cradle, moving its hands and mouth as if crying to get out.

For boys there are steam-engines, with copper boilers, an improvement on those sold last year: price $1 50 or $2. The huntsman's belt is a useful morocco belt with a chain and horn that make it attractive to the little fellows: price 75 cents. Very instructive toys are the puzzles of bits of wood put together to represent a ship, or locomotive, or steam-engine. They cost from 75 cents to $1.

An ingenious new toy is a mechanical trotting horse. This horse is attached to a buggy, in which sits the driver holding the reins. When wound up, the horse moves his legs in the most natural manner, trotting about the room, and drawing the wagon: price $2.

Musical cats and bleating lambs are 75 cents. A horse that nods its head and neighs is $5.

NOTE-PAPER AND ENVELOPES.

A choice holiday gift is an elegant papeterie, with enameled cover, filled with delicately tinted and figured French paper from the mills of Laroche-Joubert, Lacroix, & Co., Angoulême. The favorite shades are the Mikado, a lovely creamy tint; fleur de violette; fleur de rose; camée, a fine pink sardonyx; and ciel d'hiver, with the grayness of a winter's sky. A novelty in mourning stationery is a new sombre-tinted gray with black border, which is a decided relief to the strong contrast of black and white. The papeteries make beautiful work or jewel boxes when their contents are exhausted.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. BALL, BLACK, & Co.; STARR & MARCUS; and NICOL & DAVIDSON, for jewelry and fancy articles; ALTHOF, BERGMANN, & Co.; and LEWIS P. TIBBALS, for toys; and WILLARD FELT, & Co., for stationery.

PERSONAL.

THE young WADSWORTHS, of Geneseo, Livingston County, are keeping up the family fame as farmers and stock-raisers. The grandfather, JAMES WADSWORTH, went thither eighty-one years ago. He was well-to-do, and a gentleman. He accumulated the largest fortune ever acquired in his day in Western New York. General JAMES S. WADSWORTH succeeded to the general management of the estates before his father's death. He left three sons, each of whom is a large farmer. CHARLES F., the oldest, has about 800 acres, and makes the breeding of short-horn cattle a specialty. CRAIG W., the second son, resides on the old homestead, a fine old mansion at Geneseo, surrounded by 150 acres of park-like grounds. He has 1800 acres, is a thorough farmer, and a great cattle and horse raiser. He has fifty fine horses, besides those for farm work. JAMES W., the youngest, has 1300 acres in Groveland devoted to grazing, 1500 acres in Caledonia for a sheep farm, and 275 acres in Geneseo. He has fifty thorough-bred horses, and other live things innumerable. They are manly fellows, all three.

—Miss CAROLINA DE CREAGH, who has become the wife of General SICKLES, United States minister to Spain, is a young lady of twenty-two, beautiful, amiable, accomplished, and of high social position. She was quite intimate with Miss LAURA SICKLES, the General's daughter. At the wedding was Marshal SERRANO, late Regent of Spain, and many noble gentlemen and ladies of the court.

—Dr. PORTER, of Yale, made a little personal stump speech to his young men the other day, in which he said, "Don't drink, don't chew, don't deceive, don't read novels, don't marry until you can support a wife." Those were the "don'ts." For the "do's," he told them to "be in earnest;" and then he went on to say, "and be self-reliant." Good! "Be generous, and be civil." Better! "Read the papers and advertise your business." Best! That last bit of advice is what we call beautiful! Little need was there for the excellent and sagacious and learned gentleman to add, "Make money, and do good with it!" He meant, of course, that one who doesn't read the papers or advertise isn't likely to make much money, or to do much good with what little he may make.

—JOHN MILES STANDISH, the eighth lineal descendant of the historical MILES STANDISH, died on the 30th of November, in Frostburg, Maryland. He was chief engineer of the Cumberland and Pennsylvania Railroad. He was an active, amiable, social man, greatly respected by all who knew him.

—Our last exchanges bring notices of very old people, such as ROBERT BRANTON, a great-grandson of BRANT, the famous Indian chief, aged 91; Mrs. REIGLER, of German Township, Indiana, aged 105; Mrs. FRY, of Taylorsville, 104; Mrs. MILLER, of the same place, 97. The husband of the latter, a preacher, was cut off prematurely at 98.

—Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY expresses the belief that, besides a possible novel, we are certain to have from Lord Lytton a dramatized version of the "Last Days of Pompeii." Few men have more friends in private life than Lord Lytton, or have done more kindly things. The critics all like him. His friendship with DICKENS and THACKERAY was of the closest sort. My lady BULWER was not a positive admirer of DICKENS, whom she playfully described as "a pot-house PLUTARCH."

—Good Mrs BETSEY WILLIAMS, who died recently in Rhode Island, bequeathed to the city of Providence the farm upon which she died, estimated to be worth $40 000, on condition that the city erect a monument, to cost not less than $500, to the memory of ROGER WILLIAMS, in the old WILLIAMS burying-ground.

—The polite style of "personal" that obtains in the especially far West is after this manner: "Mrs. BENNETT, of Helena, Arkansas, was wooed by Mr. FISKE, but she threw FISKE to the dogs. So he inoculated her son with buckshot, and straightened his own spine with strychnine, and she is now without incumbrances."

—The library of the PENN family, notably rich in works on America voyages, and travel, is to be sold at auction in London in January next. Some of the volumes have the book plate and autograph of "WILLIAM PENN, Proprietor of Pennsylvania."

—Miss LYDIA S HALL, now employed in the Treasury at Washington, was once a Lowell factory girl, and wrote under the name of "Adelaide." She has been a missionary to the Choctaws, and in border-ruffian days lived in Kansas, where she was a considerable owner of real estate. Meeting with some misfortune in regard to titles of property, she went to Washington, and has filled a clerkship in the Treasury Department since, being also engaged in studying law in order to enable her to secure her rights in Kansas—which she will no doubt do—and return to that State, unless she gets into the cabinet. She is a lady of great versatility of talent, and would fill even a higher position than the one she now occupies with credit.

—The Methodists pinned the Grand Duke in Philadelphia, and Bishop SIMPSON let off the best speech at him that has yet been made during his wanderings. They "honeyfugled" him into a church fair, and those meek young sisters just opened his heart. Also his pocket-book. This is his record: At nearly all the tables he expended from $10 to $20. From the Green-street Church table he purchased a handsome pincushion. At the "Ebenezer" table he spent $20, purchasing a small toy. At the "Home" table he invested in a miniature hat, paying $10 for it. At the "Western" table he left $10. At the Arch-street Church table he purchased a tobacco pouch for $10. The book-stand was patronized to the extent of $3 50. The ladies at the "Summerfield" Church table smiled upon him so effectually that he spent $20 there. Two bouquets were presented to the ladies of the Arch-street Church by his Imperial Highness, and then they presented him with an afghan, of which one of the papers says, "It is the work of an old lady whom it took six years to finish." Hadn't she a constitution!

—In a pecuniary sense, Miss CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN'S power to draw shows no decadence. During her recent engagement at Booth's Theatre, she received $500 per night, and played seven times a week, including the Saturday matinée.

—Of course it is possible that ye Grand Duke ALEXIS may have had that noble membrane, his heart, touched, perhaps bumped, by some of our charming belles, else why should one of them "drop into poetry" in this wise:

"There's a Muscovite youth named ALEXIS,
Who an officer first of the decks is,
And he came here to see
What this country might be,
Ere our land to his own he annexes.

"But the young, tender heart of ALEXIS
Its owner most strangely now vexes.
That it hard has been hit he Owns up, in our city,
By one who the best of her sex is.

"He swears he would run at her beck, sis,
From St. Petersburg clear down to Texas—
And her name's—mine and his—
But, if I know my biz,
I shall never tell tales on ALEXIS."

—A daughter of Mr. GLADSTONE, so saith London report, is to be married to a German gentleman, who was the tutor of the Princess LOUISE—the Queen having had much to do in bringing it about.

—A singular person, Rev. REASON HAMMOND, probably the richest Methodist minister who has existed, died a few days ago in Kentucky. Besides lands, houses, and bonds, there was found stowed away in his house $14,000 in silver and gold—nearly 1000 pounds in weight. He had thousands in United States bonds, a large number of "five-twenties," upon which no interest had been claimed or drawn. He has 160 acres of land close to Indianapolis, for which he was offered, just before his death, $160,000, and refused it. He was a farmer as well as preacher, and had lived at Charlestown, Kentucky, over forty years. He leaves a wife and seven children, and his estate is valued at $500,000. He is said to have delivered the first sermon ever preached in Indianapolis. An anecdote is told of him, which says that when he was a young man, and this country was thinly settled, he traveled about, preaching, and driving up to a lone house in the wilds of these parts once, was asked by the inmate of the cabin—an old lady—"what he wanted." Mr. HAMMOND replied, "I am looking for the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Said she, "I don't reckon you'll find any here, bekase the wolves is bin powerful bad in these parts."

—Madame OVIEDO, the widow of that very pecunious Cuban gentleman whose "diamond" nuptials have become one of the legends of New York, has gracefully contributed one hundred dollars to the Chicago relief fund which was raised in Havana.

—Mr. WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, the tenor of the DOLBY troupe, was one of the "Gentlemen of her Majesty Queen VICTORIA'S Chapel Royal." But, coming over with the DOLBY folk, he had to resign his position, in order to pursue the even tenor and soprano of his way here.

—It is a good thing to be a cardinal; but when it comes to being a very, very old cardinal, and an infirm cardinal, it don't count for much. Now, for example, there is Cardinal AMAT, aged 77, has had a fit of apoplexy, and is very ill. Cardinal CLARELLI, 73, ditto. Cardinal BARNABO, 71, has gone almost mad with gout. Cardinal BARILI, 71, apoplexy, twice. Cardinals DE ANGELIS, 81, DE ALMADA, 91, and BILLIET, 90, are past all work. Cardinal CATERINI, 78, is in his second childhood. Cardinal DOUNET, 77, ditto. Cardinal MILESI, 55, is dying of consumption. There are twenty-four vacant hats, so that there remain but thirty-four to form a conclave. Up to the present time all the efforts of the Catholic powers to induce the Pope to create cardinals have been unavailing. But what a fine old average of years the good old cardinals make! It is a good thing to be a cardinal.

—Rev. Dr. NORMAN M'LEOD flatly denies the imputations which Mr. DISRAELI has thrown upon the mental and bodily condition of the Queen. At an entertainment recently given in Glasgow, Dr. M'LEOD, in responding to a toast to "The Queen," said: "What is meant by her Majesty being 'morally and mentally incapacitated for work' I leave Mr. DISRAELI to explain, for I do not comprehend it. I beg to say that I have had the honor, in the providence of God, to minister to her Majesty in public and in private for the last thirteen or fourteen years, and I have seen her in every variety of circumstances—in the highest prosperity and happiness which any married woman, not to speak of a queen, could enjoy, and in the very depth of her distress, and I declare most solemnly, although speaking with her in the greatest privacy and in the most intimate communion that a subject and a clergyman can have, I have never heard her utter one word or one sentiment that did not do the highest honor to her Majesty, whether as a queen or a woman. I have not only never seen the remotest trace of any moral or mental weakness, but I have seen in every instance remarkable evidence of moral and mental strength and capacity. Her Majesty has just passed through a severe attack of rheumatic gout, which so affected her hands that for a time she was utterly unable to sign her name, and from a severe neuralgia, from which she has entirely recovered, and I have never seen her better in spirits or better in health or stronger in mind than she is at the present moment. At the same time, I am far from saying that she has recovered her strength as to be able to do more than she is doing; for I make bold to say that none of us have the slightest conception of the unceasing demand that is made upon a person in her high position of attending to innumerable details, and carrying burdens upon her mind without the possibility of one moment's rest. Our own wives find how trying upon their nervous energy is the constant care of a large family; but when we think what the Queen has to do as a mother, with her children occupying such an important position in society, what she has to do in being compelled ever to think about the affairs of a nation to whose interests she is profoundly devoted—when we think of the constant weight that must ever be upon her mind, we feel the wonder is that she is able to perform her duties in the way that she has done."

Tapestry Design for Lambrequins.

THIS design is especially intended for trimming window lambrequins, and is worked for this purpose on coarse canvas with double zephyr worsted in the colors given in the description of symbols. When worked on fine canvas with single zephyr in half cross stitch, it is suitable for waste and wood baskets, etc. Line the lambrequin, and finish it on the edge with cord and tassels.

Toilette Box with Pincushion.

THE original consists of a round card-board box covered with blue silk, three inches and three-quarters in diameter and an inch and a quarter in height, on which is set a four-cornered cushion of blue velvet. The cover of the box is finished with a pleated ruffle of blue satin ribbon three-quarters of an inch wide, the seam of which is covered with blue velvet ribbon one-third of an inch wide, ornamented in herring-bone stitch with white and red silk. The cushion is filled with sawdust or emery, and is covered on the bottom with satin, and on the top with velvet. The top is embroidered, as shown by the illustration, in point Russe with white and red silk. On the outer edge of the cushion work bias stitches alternately with crystal and steel beads, simulating a cord, and on each corner set a small tassel of similar beads. Set the cushion on the cover of the box as shown by the illustration.

Crochet Waste Basket.

THIS pretty basket, which is designed to hold bits of thread, worsted, etc., is crocheted with medium-sized gray cotton. It is then varnished black, embroidered in point Russe with red worsted, and furnished with a red silk bag, which at the same time forms the lining. Begin the basket at the middle of the bottom, and on a foundation of fine twine work 8 sc. (single crochet), close these in a ring, and work, always going forward and on the foundation of twine, ten rounds of sc., widening so many st. (stitch) that the ring neither fulls up nor draws. Turn the bottom so that the wrong side of the crochet stitches forms the under side of the basket, and for the edge of the latter crochet three times alternately one round of close and one round of open-work dc. (double crochet), always separating the latter by 1 ch. (chain stitch) and an interval of 1 st. In the last two rounds of close dc. widen 1 dc. each at regular intervals. On the last round of open-work dc. work one more round of sc. and two rounds of ch. scallops, each of which consists of 7 ch. and 1 sc.; with the scallops in the first of these two rounds pass over 3 st. each. When the crochet-work is finished, coat it over several times with black varnish, and let it dry on a suitable shape (for instance, on the under part of a flower-pot). Now work the point Russe embroidery with red worsted as shown by the illustration, taking the worsted fourfold for the diagonal stitches, and double for the middle rib; the latter is fastened by means of short cross stitches. Finally, sew the bag on the basket, and through the shirr in the former draw two pieces of silk cord ornamented with tassels.

THE cover for this pillow consists of écru Java canvas, which is trimmed with diagonal stripes of embroidery and appliqué pointed stripes of black velvet. The embroidery is worked partly in point Russe and cross stitch with different colors, forming lively contrasts, in the design shown by Fig. 2, and partly in point Russe with black silk. The arrangement of these embroidery stripes is shown by Fig. 1; they are edged on both sides with diagonal stitches of black silk and with twisted gold cord. The pointed strips of velvet applied in the intervals are fastened by means of two rows of stitching with black saddler's silk, as shown by Fig. 1. Coarse twisted silk cord and tassels, of saddler's silk of different colors, complete the sofa-pillow.

Ladies' and Children's Dresses.

Fig. 1. — MARGUERITE VEST-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This stylish polonaise has the Marguerite back and vest front, which we have often described. The original is made of réséda green cashmere. The walking skirt is trimmed with a flounce ten inches wide, arranged in series of pleats, interrupted by rosettes of the same material, set on perpendicularly. The vest is buttoned from the throat to the bottom, and is furnished with revers, edged with a box-pleating of the material, which extends down the open front and around the bottom of the polonaise. The bottom of the polonaise is also edged with fringe.

The pattern is furnished in nine sizes, even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches, bust measure. To ascertain this, pass a tape measure entirely around the body, drawing it moderately tight, under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust. No other measure is required. If the size is an odd number, for instance, 37 inches, send for 38 inches, and take the seams deeper than allowed in the pattern. The quantity of material is estimated for a person of average size—34 inches, bust measure.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises two articles—Marguerite vest-polonaise and six-gored walking skirt.

MARGUERITE VEST-POLONAISE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, back, side back, vest, revers, and collar. The garment is furnished with a vest, which extends about six inches below the waist. It is fitted with two darts on each side and a cross basque seam. The polonaise front is cut away on each side, and is fitted with one dart on each side of the middle, extending to the bottom of the armhole. The front is finished with a revers with a collar in the back, which is very narrow. The back is fitted with a seam in the middle and side forms. About three inches below the waist line, at each side back seam, an extra width is cut on the skirt, which is laid in small side pleats turned under, the same on the middle seam. Two deep pleats are laid in the middle of the back breadth and at each side back seam from the perforations, and are tacked at the points of the basque, the pleats turning upward. Six pleats are laid between the two notches, nineteen inches apart, in the back edge of the front of the garment, turning upward, one overlapping the other, in a space of two inches. The side seams are then joined, being particular to place the notches evenly together; the six pleats on the front are to be sewed between the two notches two inches apart on the front edge of the side seam. The vest front is sewed in at the seams on the shoulder and under the arms. The pleats on each side seam at the point of the basque are concealed by a bow. Close the seams according to the notches, place the fronts over the vest as notched, baste up, and try on wrong side out. If alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. The sleeve is rounded at the outer edge of the bottom, and left open to the notch. Place the longest seam to the notch in the back of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. Close the front of the vest with buttons and button-holes. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all the other seams. The perforations show where to baste the seams, to take up the darts and cross basque seam, and to lay the pleats in the back of the skirt, and the size and shape of the under part of the sleeve.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8½ yards.

Extra for trimming, 2 yards.

Fringe, 4½ yards.

SIX-GORED WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—half of front gore, two side gores, and half of back breadth. Cut the front and back with the longest straight edge laid on the fold of the cloth to avoid a seam. Cut two pieces like the pattern given of the side gores, and put the skirt together by the notches. The front gore is sewed on the belt plain, the side gores are laid in small pleats, and the back breadth is gathered.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 8 yards.

Extra for trimming, 3 yards.

YES OR NO?

Must it be No?
Ah, no!
Dear love,
The sunbeams, all sadly and slow,
Would mourningly come to me so,
Dear love.

May it be Yes?
Ah, yes!
Dear love,
Let me twine round my finger that tress
The bold sunshine so dares to caress,
Dear love.

Shall it be No?
Ah, no!
Dear love,
The breezes would wailingly go
To whisper such message of woe,
Dear love.

Will it be Yes?
Ah, yes!
Dear love,
Let the summer winds waft me a kiss
From those lips 'twould be heaven to press,
Dear love!

CHAPTER XXXVII.

"FROM CLARISSA."

That jewel which Clarissa had given to Bessie Lovel was a treasure of price, the very possession whereof was always an oppressive joy to the poor little woman, whose chief knowledge of life came from the experience of its debts and difficulties. That the massive gold locket with the diamond cross would be required of her sooner or later, to be handed into the ruthless paw of a clerk at the mont-de-piété, she had little doubt. Every thing that she or her husband had ever possessed worth possessing had so vanished—had been not an absolute property, but a brief fleeting joy, a kind of supernal visitant, vanishing anon into nothingness, or only a pawnbroker's duplicate. The time would come. She showed the trinket to her husband with a melancholy foreboding, and read his thoughts as he weighed it in his palm, by mere force of habit, speculating what it would fetch, if in his desperate needs this waif might serve him.

She was not surprised, therefore—only a little distressed—when Austin broached the subject one day at his late breakfast—that breakfast at which it needed nearly a bottle of claret to wash down three or four mouthfuls of savory pie, or half a tiny cutlet. She had possessed the bauble more than a month, holding it in fear and trembling, and only astonished that it had not been demanded of her.

"Oh, by-the-way, Bess," Austin Lovel said, carelessly, "I was abominably unlucky last night at Madame Caballero's. I'm generally lugged in for a game or two at écarté there, you know. One can't refuse in a house of that kind. And I had been doing wonders. They were betting on my game, and I stood to win something handsome, when the luck changed all in a moment. The fellow I was playing against marked the king three times running; and, in short, I rose a considerable loser—considerable for me, that is to say. I told my antagonist I should send him the money to-day. He's a kind of man I can't afford to trifle with; and you know the Caballero connection is of too much use to be jeopardized. So I've been thinking, Bess, that if you'd let me have that gimcrack locket my sister gave you, I could raise a tenner on it. Clary can afford to give you plenty of such things, even if it were lost, which it need not be."

Of course not. Mrs. Lovel had been told as much about the little Geneva watch which her husband had given her a few days after her marriage, and had taken away from her six weeks later. But the watch had never come back to her. She gave a faint sigh of resignation. It was not within the compass of her mind to oppose him.

"We shall never get on while you play cards, Austin," she said, sadly.

"My dear Bessie, a man may win as well as lose. You see, when I go into society there are certain things expected of me; and my only chance of getting on is by making myself agreeable to the people whose influence is worth having."

"But I can't see that card-playing leads to your getting commissions for pictures, Austin, no more than horse-racing or billiards. It all seems to end the same—in your losing money."

The painter pushed away his plate with an impatient gesture. He was taking his breakfast in his painting-room, hours after the family meal, Bessie waiting upon him, and cobbling some juvenile garment during the intervals of her attendance. He pushed his plate aside, and got up to pace the room in the restless way that was common to him on such occasions.

"My dear child, if you don't want to give me the locket, say so," he said, "but don't treat me to a sermon. You can keep it if you like, though I can't conceive what use the thing can be to you. It's not a thing you can wear."

"Not at home, dear, certainly; and I never go out," the wife answered, with the faintest touch of reproachfulness. "I am very fond of it, though, for your sister's sake. It was so kind of her to bring it to me, and such a new thing for me to have a present. But you are welcome to it, Austin, if you really want it."

"If I really want it! Do you suppose I should be mean enough to ask you for it if I didn't? I shouldn't so much care about it, you see, only I am to meet the man to-morrow evening at dinner, and I can't face him without the money. So if you'll look the thing out some time to-day, Bess, I'll take it down to the Quai between this and to-morrow afternoon, and get the business over."

Thus it was that George Fairfax, strolling into Mrs. Lovel's sitting-room that afternoon while Austin was out, happened to find her seated in a pensive attitude, with an open work-box before her and Clarissa's locket in her hand. It was a shabby, battered old box, but had been for years the repository of all Bessie's treasures.

She had kept the locket there, looking at it very often, and wondering if she would ever be able to wear it—if Austin would take her to a theatre, for instance, or give a little dinner at home instead of abroad, for once in a way, to some of the men whose society absorbed so much of his time.

There was no hope of this now. Once gone from her hands, the treasure would return no more. She knew that very well, and was indulging her grief by a farewell contemplation of the trinket, when Mr. Fairfax came into the room.

The flash of the diamonds caught his quick eye.

"What a pretty locket you've got there, Mrs. Austin!" he said, as he shook hands with her. "A New-Year's gift from Austin, I suppose?"

"No; it was my sister-in-law, Mrs. Granger, who gave it me," Bessie answered, with a sigh.

He was interested in it immediately, but was careful not to betray his interest. Mrs. Lovel put it into his hands. She was proud of it even in this last hour of possession. "Perhaps you'd like to look at it," she said. "It's got her 'air inside."

Yes, there was a circlet of the dark brown hair he knew so well, and the two words, "From Clarissa."

"Upon my word, it's very handsome," he said, looking at the diamond cross outside, but thinking of the love-lock within. "I never saw a locket I liked better. You are very fond of it, I dare say?" he added, interrogatively.

"Oh yes, I like it very much! I can't bear to part with it."

And here Bessie Lovel, not being gifted with the power of concealing her emotions, fairly broke down and cried like a child.

"My dear Mrs. Austin," exclaimed George Fairfax, "pray don't distress yourself like that. Part with it? Why should you part with your locket?"

"Oh, Mr. Fairfax, I oughtn't to have told you—Austin would be so angry if he knew—but he has been losing money at that horrid ecarty, and he says he must have ten pounds to-morrow; so my beautiful locket must go to the pawnbroker's."

George Fairfax paused. His first impulse was to lend the poor little woman the money—the veriest trifle, of course, to the Lord of Lyvedon. But the next moment another idea presented itself to him. He had the locket lying in the open palm of his hand. It would be so sweet to possess that lock of hair—to wear so dear a token of his mistress. Even those two words, "From Clarissa," had a kind of magic for him. It was a foolish weakness, of course; but then love is made up of such follies.

"If you really mean to part with this," he said, "I should be very glad to have it. I would give you more than any pawnbroker—say, twenty instead of ten pounds, for instance—and a new locket for yourself into the bargain. I shouldn't like to deprive you of an ornament you valued without some kind of compensation. I have taken a fancy to the design of the thing, and should really like to have it. What do you say now, Mrs. Austin—shall that be a transaction between you and me, without any reference to your husband, who might be angry with you for having let me into domestic secrets? You can tell him you got the money from the mont-de-piété. Look here, now; let's settle the business at once."

He opened his purse, and tumbled the contents out upon the table. Bessie Lovel thought what a blessed state of existence that must be in which people walked this world with all that ready money about them.

"There are just four-and-twenty pounds here," he said, cheerily; "so we'll say four-and-twenty."

He saw that she was yielding.

"And would you really give me a locket for myself," she said, almost incredulously, "as well as this money?"

"Unquestionably. As good an one as I can find in the Rue de la Paix. This has diamonds, and that shall have diamonds. It's the design, you see," he added, persuasively, "that has taken my fancy."

"I'm sure you are very generous," Bessie murmured, still hesitating.

"Generous! Pshaw! not at all. It's a caprice; and I shall consider myself under an obligation to you if you gratify it."

The temptation was irresistible. To obtain the money that was required—more than double the sum her husband had wanted—and to have another locket as well! Never, surely, had there been such a bargain since the famous magician offered new lamps for old ones. Of course, it was only Mr. Fairfax's delicate way of doing them a kindness; his fancy for the locket was merely a benevolent pretense. What could he care for that particular trinket—he who might, so to speak, walk knee-deep in diamonds, if he pleased?

She took the twenty-four pounds—an English ten-pound note, and the rest in new glittering napoleons—and then began to speculate upon the possibility of giving Austin twenty pounds, and appropriating the balance to her own uses. The children wanted so many things—that perpetual want of the juvenile population above all, shoe-leather; and might she not even screw some cheap dress for herself out of the sum? while, if it were all given to Austin, it would vanish, like smoke before the wind, leaving no trace behind.

So George Fairfax put the bauble in his waistcoat pocket, and whatever sentimental pleasure might be derived from such a talisman was his. There are those among our disciples of modern magic who believe there is a subtile animal magnetism in such things; that the mere possession of such a token constitutes a kind of spiritual link between two beings. Mr. Fairfax had no such fancy; but it pleased him to have obtained that which no prayers of his could have won from Clarissa herself—not at present, that is to say. It would all come in good time. She loved him; secure of that one fact, he believed all the rest a mere question of patience and constancy.

"And she is worth the winning," he said to himself. "A man might serve for a longer slavery than Jacob's, and yet be rewarded by such a conquest. I think, by-the-way, that Rachel must have been just a trifle faded when the patriarch was out of his time."

He dawdled away an hour or so in Bessie's salon—telling the poor little woman the news of the day, and playing with the two boys, who regarded him as a beneficent being, from whose hands flowed perpetual toys and sweetmeats. He waited as long as he could without making his motive obvious; waited, in the hope that Clarissa would come; and then, as there was no sign of her coming, and Austin was still out, he wished Bessie good-by.

"I sha'n't forget the locket," he said, as he departed.

Austin came in five minutes afterward. The boys had been scuttled off to take their evening meal in the kitchen—a darksome cupboard about eight feet square—where the tawdry servant was perpetually stewing savory messes upon a small charcoal stove.

Bessie handed her husband the ten-pound note, and twelve bright napoleons.

"Why, what's this?" he asked.

"The—the money for the locket, Austin. I thought you might be late home; so I ran round to the Quai with it myself. And I asked for twenty pounds, and the man gave it to me."

"Why, that's a brave girl!" cried Austin, kissing the pleading face uplifted to his. "I don't believe they'd have given me as much. An English tenner, though; that's odd!" he added, carelessly, and then slipped the cash loose into his pocket, with the air of a man for whom money is at best a temporary possession.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THAT IS WHAT LOVE MEANS.

The Grangers and Mr. Fairfax went on meeting in society; and Daniel Granger, with whom it was a kind of habit to ask men to dinner, could hardly avoid inviting George Fairfax. It might have seemed invidious to do so; and for what reason should he make such a distinction? Even to himself Mr. Granger would not be willing to confess that he was jealous of this man. So Mr. Fairfax came with others of his species to the gorgeous caravansérai in the Rue de Morny, where the rooms never by any chance looked as if people lived in them, but rather as if they were waiting-rooms at some railway station, got up with temporary splendor for the reception of royalty.

He came; and though Clarissa sometimes made feeble efforts to avoid him, it happened almost always that, before the evening was out, he found some few minutes for unreserved talk with her. There is little need to record such brief stolen interviews—a few hurried words by the piano, a sentence or two in a lowered voice at parting. There was not much in the words, perhaps—only very common words, that have done duty between thousands of men and women—a kind of signal code, as it were; and yet they had power to poison Clarissa's life, to take the sweetness out of every joy, even a mother's innocent idolatry of her child.

The words were spoken; but so carefully did George Fairfax play his part, that not even Sophia's sharp eyes could perceive more than was correct in the conduct of her step-mother. No, she told herself, that other flirtation was the desperate one. Clarissa might have had some preference for George Fairfax; there had been occasional indications of such a feeling in her manner at Hale Castle; but the dark spot of her life, the secret of her girlhood, was a love-affair with Mr. Austin.

By way of experiment, one day she asked her father's wife a question about the painter.

"You seemed to admire Mr. Austin very much, Clarissa," she said, "and I admit that he is remarkably clever; but he appears such a waif and stray. In all his conversation with us he never threw much light upon his own history. Do you know any thing of his antecedents?"

Clarissa blushed in spite of herself. The deception she had sustained so long was unspeakably distasteful to her. Again and again she had been tempted to hazard every thing, and acknowledge Austin as her brother, whether he liked or not that she should do so. It was only his peremptory tone that had kept her silent.

"What should I know of his antecedents more than you, Sophy?" she said, avoiding a more direct reply. "It is quite enough for me to know that he has undeniable genius."

The blush, and a certain warmth in her tone, seemed to Sophia conclusive evidence of her hidden regard for this man. Miss Granger's heart beat a good deal faster than usual, and little jealous sparkles shone in her cold gray eyes. She had never admired any man so much as she had admired this brilliant young painter. Many men had paid her compliments; as the rich Mr. Granger's sole daughter and heiress, she had been gratified with no meagre share of mankind's worship; but no words ever spoken had sounded so sweet in her ears as those few civil speeches that Mr. Austin had found time to address to her during his visits to the Rue de Morny. And after having taken so much pleasure in his converse, and thought so much more about him than she would have considered it proper for any model villager to think about an individual of the opposite sex, it was a hard thing to find—first, that the base impostor had a wife; and secondly, that whatever illegitimate worship he might have to render was to be offered at the shrine of Clarissa.

"Indeed!" she exclaimed, with an air of extreme surprise. "You seemed on such very friendly terms with him, that I fancied you must really have known each other before, and that you had some motive for concealing the fact from papa."

Clarissa blushed a deeper crimson at this home-thrust, and bent a little lower over her drawing-board. It seemed a fortunate thing that she happened to be painting when Miss Granger opened her guns upon her in this manner.

"He gives lessons, I believe; does he not?" asked Sophia.

"Yes—I—I believe—I have heard so."

"Do you know, I took it into my head that he might have been your drawing-master at Belforêt."

Clarissa laughed aloud at this suggestion. Miss Granger's persistent curiosity amused her a little, dangerous as the ground was.

"Oh dear, no, he was not our master at Belforêt," she said. "We had a little old Swiss—such an ancient, ancient man—who took snuff continually, and was always talking about his pays natal and Jean Jacques Rousseau. I think he had known Rousseau; and I am sure he was old enough to remember the night they locked him out of Geneva."

Sophia was fairly posed; she had been on a false scent evidently, and yet she was sure there was something. That is how she shaped her doubts in her own mind—there was something. Warman thought so, she knew; and Warman was gifted with no ordinary amount of penetration.

So Mrs. Granger went her way, with suspicion around and about her, and danger ahead. Whatever peace had been hers in the brief period of her married life—and the quiet spring-time and summer that came after her baby's birth had been very peaceful—had vanished now. A cloud of fear encompassed her; a constant melancholy possessed her; a pleading voice, which she ought never to have heard, was always in her ears—a voice that charged her with the burden of a broken life—a voice that told her it was only by some sacrifice of her own she could atone for the sacrifice that had been made for her—a too persuasive voice, with a perilous charm in its every accent.

She loved him. That she could ever be weak enough, or vile enough, to sink into that dread abyss whereto some women have gone down for the love of man, was not within the compass of her thought. But she knew that no day in her life was sinless now; that no pure and innocent joys were left to her; that her every thought of George Fairfax was a sin against her husband.

And yet she went on loving him. Sometimes, when the sense of her guilt was strongest, she would fain have asked her husband to take her back to Arden; which must needs be a kind of sanctuary, as it were, she thought. Nay, hardly so; for even in that tranquil retreat Temple Fairfax had contrived to pursue her mother, with the poison of his influence and his presence. Very often she felt inclined to ask her husband this favor; but she could not do so without running some risk of betraying herself—Heaven knows how much she might betray—unawares. Again, their sojourn in the Rue de Morny was not to endure forever. Already Mr. Granger had expressed himself somewhat tired of Paris; indeed, what denizen of that brilliant city does not become a little weary of its brightness, sooner or later, and fall sick of the Boulevard fever—a harassing sense of all-pervading glare and confusion, a sensation of Paris on the brain?

There was some talk of returning to Arden at the end of a month. They were now at the close of January; by the first of March Mr. Granger hoped to be at the Court. His architect and his head bailiff were alike eager for his return; there were more pullings down and reconstructions required on the new estate; there were all manner of recondite experiments to be tried in scientific farming; there were new leases to be granted, and expiring leases, the covenants whereof must be executed.

Since they were likely to leave Paris so soon, it would be foolish to excite wonder by asking to leave sooner, Mrs. Granger thought. It mattered so little, after all, she told herself sometimes. It mattered this much only—that day by day her feet were straying farther from the right road.

Oh those happy winter afternoons in the Rue du Chevalier Bayard! Such innocent happiness, too, in all seeming—only a little animated rambling talk upon all manner of subjects, from the loftiest problems in philosophy to the frothiest gossip of the Faubourg St. Honoré; only the presence of two people who loved each other to distraction. A dim fire-lit room; a little commonplace woman coming in and out; two young men disputing in the dusk; and Clarissa in her low chair by the fire, listening to the magical voice that was now the only music of her dreams. If it could have gone on forever thus—a sweet sentimental friendship like that which linked Madame Roland and Brissot, Madame Récamier and Châteaubriand—there would surely have been no harm, Clarissa sometimes argued with herself. She was married to a man whom she could respect for many qualities of his heart and mind, against whom she could never seriously offend. Was it so great a sin if the friendship of George Fairfax was dear to her? if the few happy hours of her life were those she spent in his company? But such special pleading as this was the poorest sophistry; at heart she was conscious that it was so. A woman has a double conscience, as it were—a holy of holies within the temple of her mind, to which falsehood can not enter. She may refuse to lift the screen, and meet the truth face to face; but it is there—not to be extinguished—eternal, immutable; the divine lamp given for her guidance, if only she will not withdraw herself from its light.

Just a little less than a month before his intended departure, Mr. Granger had a letter from that exacting bailiff, entreating his return. Something in the scientific farming had gone wrong: some great sewage question was at issue, and none but the lord of the soil himself could settle the matter. Very dear to Daniel Granger were those lands of Arden, that Arden-Court estate which he had made to spread itself so far over the face of the county. Sweet are ancestral domains, no doubt; dear by association, made holy by the pride of race; but perhaps sweeter to the soul of man are those acres he has won by the work of his own strong hand, or his own steadfast brain. Next to his wife and children, in Mr. Granger's regard, were the lands of Arden: the farms and homesteads, in valleys and on hill-tops; the cottages and school houses, which he had built for the improvement of his species; the brand-new slack-baked Gothic church in an outlying village, where a church had never been before his coming.

He was sorry to leave his wife; but the question at stake was an important one. If he could have carried his household away with him at an hour's notice, he would gladly have done so; but to move Clarissa, and the nurse, and the baby, and Miss Granger, would be rather a formidable business—in fact, a thing not to be done without elaborate preparation. He had the apartments in the Rue de Morny on his hands, too, until the beginning of March; and even a millionaire seldom cares to waste such a rental as Parisian proprietors exact for house-room in the fashionable quarter. So he decided upon going to Arden at once—which was essential—and returning directly he had adjusted matters with his bailiff, and done a morning's work with his architect.

He told Clarissa of his intention one evening when they had returned from a dinner-party, and she was seated before her dressing-table, taking off her jewels in a slow, absent way. She looked up with a start as her husband came into the room and planted himself on the white sheep-skin rug, with his back against the mantel-piece.

"I am obliged to go back to Yorkshire, Clary," he said.

She thought he meant they were all going back—that it was an interposition of Providence, and she was to be taken away from sin and danger. But oh, how hard it seemed to go—never again to look forward to those stolen twilights in her brother's painting-room!

"I am glad!" she exclaimed. "I shall be very glad to go back to Arden."

"You, my dear!" said her husband; "it is only I who am going. There is some hitch in our experiments on the home farm, and Forley knows how anxious I am about making a success this year. So he wants me to run over and see to things; he won't accept the responsibility of carrying on any longer without me. I needn't be away above two or three days, or a week at most. You can get on very well without me."

Clarissa was silent, looking down at a bracelet which she was turning idly round her arm. Get on without him! Alas, what part had Daniel Granger played in her life of late beyond that of some supernumerary king in a stage-play?—a person of importance by rank and title in the play-bill, but of scarcely any significance to the story. Her guilty heart told her how little he had ever been to her; how, day by day, he had been growing less and less. And while he was away, she might go to the Rue du Chevalier Bayard every day. There would be nothing to prevent her so doing, if she pleased. The carriage was nominally and actually hers. There was a brougham at Miss Granger's disposal, but the landau was essentially Clarissa's carriage.

"You can get on very well without me," repeated Mr. Granger. "I do not think my presence or absence makes very much difference to you, Clarissa," he added, in a grave, displeased tone.

It was almost his first hint of a reproach. To his wife's guilty heart it struck sharply home, like an unexpected blow. She looked up at him with a pale conscience-stricken face, in which he might have read much more than he did read there. He only thought that he had spoken a shade too severely—that he had wounded her.

"I—I don't know what you mean by that," she faltered, helplessly. "I always try to please you."

"Try to please me!" he repeated, passionately. "Yes, Clary, as a child tries to please a schoolmaster. Do you know that when I married you I was mad enough to hope the day would come when you would love me—that you loved me a little even then? Do you know how I have waited for that day, and have learned to understand, little by little, that it never can dawn for me upon this earth? You are my wife, and the mother of my child; and yet, God knows, you are no nearer to me than the day I first saw you at Hale Castle—a slim girlish figure in a white dress, coming in at the door of the library. Not a whit nearer," he went on to himself rather than to Clarissa; "but so much more dear."

There was a passion in his words which touched his wife. If it had only been possible for her to love him! if gratitude and respect, joined together, could have made up the sum of love! But they could not. She knew that George Fairfax was in all moral qualities this man's inferior; yet for some indefinable charm, some trick of tone or manner, some curious magic in a smile or a glance, she loved him.

She was silent. Perhaps the sense of her guilt came more fully home to her in this moment than it had ever done before. What words could she speak to bring comfort to her husband's soul—she whose whole life was a lie?

Daniel Granger wandered up and down the room for some minutes in a vague, restless way, and then came to his wife's chair and looked down at her very tenderly.

"My dear, I do wrong to worry you with reproaches," he said. "The mistake has been mine. From first to last, I have been to blame. I suppose in the wisest life there must always be some folly. Mine has been the hope that I could win your love. It is gone now, Clarissa; it is quite gone. Not even my child has given me a place in your heart."

She looked up at him again, with that look which expressed such a depth of remorse.

"I am very wicked," she said; "I am utterly unworthy of all you have done for me. It would have been better for you never to have seen my face."

"Wicked! no, Clary. Your only sin has been to have disappointed a foolish fancy. What right had I to suppose you loved me? Better never to have seen your face?—yes, perhaps that might have been better. But, once having seen you, I would rather be wretched with you than happy with any other woman in the world. That is what love means, Clary."

He stooped down to kiss her.

"Say no more, dear," he said. "I never meant to speak as I have spoken to-night. I love you forever."

The day came when she remembered those words, "I love you forever."

If she could have thrown herself upon his breast and acknowledged all her weakness, beseeching him to shield her from herself, in obedience to the impulse of that moment, what a world of anguish might have been spared to these two! But she let the impulse pass, and kept silence.

LIFE IN FLORENCE.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

I WISH Italian coachmen and drivers of all sorts did not think it necessary to whip their animals, or, at least, snap their whips, so constantly; for even if the lash do not always descend, the noise must irritate the poor beasts, and fill them with a nervous fear lest they should never go fast enough. The cruelty of Italians toward horses and other draught animals is proverbial (I remember it called out a printed protest from the foreign travelers in Naples three years ago), and is the more remarkable in contrast with their excessive fondness for and indulgence to cats and dogs and other household pets. I have seen great grown-up men, well-dressed men, men of business, hugging dogs in the street or in shop doors, and begging a kiss from their reluctant rosy tongues with the most unwearied repetition of endearing tones and expressions. Indeed, almost every man, woman, and child has a dog in tow; and I doubt if even the fact that one of these creatures went mad the other day, and bit several people before he could be killed, will have the effect to diminish their numbers. Cats, too, abound, and are almost universally fed and petted into that state of blinking quietude which is the highest development of cathood during the hours of daylight. Scarcely a stall in market but has one for an ornament; scarcely a shop where one does not habitually walk up and down the counter in dignified oblivion of the silks and laces, upon which its well-washed paws leave no trace in passing; not a church, I may safely say, which does not harbor a goodly number of these beautiful creatures in its dusky chapels and silent cloisters. It is one source of regret for the downfall of the papacy and the secularization of the monasteries that thereby many a sleek, comfortable cat is in danger of being deprived of her accustomed portion of sunshine, silence, and abundant food. I counted seven at once in the green court of San Lorenzo a few days ago; and the other afternoon, on entering the cathedral at an hour when there was no service, and half a dozen scattered worshipers and the crippled beggars at the doors were the only human beings in sight, I found a great gray and black tabby sitting in the middle of the vast marble floor, looking steadfastly toward the altar, and apparently absorbed in religious meditation. The contrast between that magnificent edifice and the round ball of animated fur in the middle of it, was a thing to be remembered with joy forever. I remained in adoring contemplation for a while, and then walked softly up the nave to the spot occupied by pussy. She allowed me to stroke her back for a moment, and then went deliberately away into the shadow of a pillar, where she again seated herself, and resumed her devotional attitude. Other parties coming in and disturbing her caused again "a change of base," but she remained always in the nave, and always with her gaze directed alturward; and there I left her.

A short time ago, as I was passing a small furniture shop, I stopped to speak to a cat, whose favorite sleeping-place is on a bed by the door. She raised her head to meet my caressing touch, and after enjoying it for a moment, rose, stretched herself, and walked up my extended arm to my shoulder, where she seated herself, curled her tail around her feet, and seemed to have made up her mind to a particularly good snooze, which I, being pressed for time, was obliged to convert for her into a very short cat-nap. In the same street is a little grocery shop, in front of whose ever-open door is almost always to be seen a mild-faced cat attended by two plump kittens. I call this cat the devout mother, because she is always looking upward with the air of one whose conversation is in heaven; her real object being, however, to watch the upper windows of the opposite house, from whence are thrown occasionally scraps of meat for her delectation.

The markets of Florence are very queer places. To be sure, they are a disgrace to the city, from their being held in such narrow, dark streets; but that is not my affair, and it is as good as a play to go through them. One sees there every variety of dirt, as well as the most picturesque groupings of still-life and animated nature. It is tantalizing to pass that way coming home, tired and hungry, from a morning's expedition, and hear the little fish sizzling in the great kettles of boiling fat, and see the thin crisp slices of fried mush lying in rows upon a hot pan, waiting for purchasers less fastidious than the forestieri.

Indeed, all the street sights and sounds of these Italian cities are interesting to a traveler from the eminently practical New World. The varieties of architecture; the superabundance of churches; the almost constant ringing and jangling of bells; the crash of military bands; the frequent bursts of harmonious singing; the yells and cries of itinerant salesmen; the picturesque appearance of priests and friars in their long robes of black, brown, or white; of officers in gay uniforms; of peasant nurses in full costume; the stately carriages of the fashionable citizens, alternating with country wagons drawn by ponies or donkeys, their harness studded with brass nails, and further ornamented by a curved beak, or prow, rising from the middle strap; the occasional passing of an ecclesiastical pageant carrying the Host to a dying penitent, or of a procession of masked Brethren attending a dead body to its final rest, and heralding their approach by the glare of torches and the wailing tones of a funeral chant—all these contrasts give a life and character to the scene which are totally unknown in our methodical ways of doing business at home.

It is a curious study to watch the moving throngs in the principal streets, where there is much people and little space, and where, nevertheless, no one is in a hurry. The ladies tilt along in their high-heeled boots, with no fear that their sweeping skirts will be trampled upon by irreverent men of business; and the gentlemen assemble in knots, to scrutinize the said ladies or to gossip with each other, paying no regard to the narrowness of the sidewalks or the rights of passers-by; nay, they contrive to take up additional room by standing with arms akimbo, and canes and umbrella-handles projecting in every direction, while the patient people who really have an object in view thread their way through and around these obstacles as best they can. One thinks of Broadway and the Strand, and wishes that these aggravating cumberers of the ground might be put through a thorough course of training in the "keep to the right" and "move on" of an active and intelligent policeman.

The number of crippled, deformed, and diseased persons whom one meets in the streets of Italian cities is astonishing. In no other part of the world, unless it be Egypt, are there to be seen so many blind, one-eyed, cross-eyed, crooked-eyed, wall-eyed, sore-eyed people as in Italy. Also dwarfs—no one who has been in Florence will ever be likely to spend "a quarter" to see the Tom Thumb troupe again. I sometimes resolve to count the number of malformed, unformed, and deformed whom I shall meet within a given space in my daily walk; but I soon give it up—it is like trying to count priests in Rome.

I have been reading and glancing over a great many English books of late, and have been amused to find faults, in grammar as well as in style, from sources whence one would expect accuracy and elegance. You know, it is a common English notion that Americans can neither speak nor write the language as well as they themselves do; and so it is very funny to catch them tripping so often, both in conversation and in books. I have looked through scores of histories, novels, biographies, travels, etc., etc., during the past year, and have found scarcely one that does not deserve criticism in manner, if not in matter. To say nothing of obscurity in personal pronouns, of an indiscriminate use of don't and doesn't, of double pluperfects, and of objective cases after the neuter verb, they all fail under the more delicate tests of this and that kind of, instead of these and those kinds of, and would rather, would better, instead of had rather, had better. I suppose the latter fault—had rather, had better—arose from the would being used in contraction with the pronoun, as you'd better, I'd rather; at any rate, it seems to be as freely employed in English English as in American English; and I have even found ain't in English books—a monstrosity which our "onnatteral old pairent" has always thrust off upon us. I do wish the English would let us love them better: there is so much that is good and sound about them, and their country (when one can put the poverty of the poor out of sight) is one beautiful home; but they are so prejudiced, so narrow in their sympathies toward every thing that is not English, so ridiculously fond of rank and station, and so obstinately determined to misunderstand and depreciate America, that they make it an up-hill business for us to cultivate the friendly relations that ought to subsist between the two nations.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BEATRICE V. S.—Get a plum-colored serge, and make by the Vest-Basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 41, Vol. IV. Wear a rose-colored neck-tie with it.

CHICAGO.—It is not usual to fee your pastor for performing funeral rites; but when you summon a clergyman from another place, it is quite proper that you should defray the cost of his journey.

FANNIE.—Black is more stylish than colors. Trim with bias bands of gros grain.

F. A. M., JUN.—The lines that you quote are so singularly devoid of sense that we think it quite superfluous to discuss their application.

ADMIRER.—As the principal points of interest in New York city, we would suggest the Central and other parks; the public buildings, such as the Custom-house, City Hall, new Court-house, Hall of Records, and Post-office—interesting as having been used as prison-houses during the Revolution—Castle Garden, Trinity, Grace, and other churches, the Cooper Union, the Astor, Mercantile, Historical, and Society libraries, the public institutions on the islands in the East River, the Academy of Music, the Academy of Design, and such picture-galleries and other entertainments as chance to be open when you are here.

PERPLEXITY.—You are under no obligations to invite any one to call on or visit you simply because you meet him at a friend's house; though it is often courteous to do so where you have no objection to continuing the acquaintance. It is a safe rule, however, never to ask a person to visit you if you do not want him to accept the invitation. The gentleman gives precedence to the lady in walking up the aisle.

M. H. W.—Whale-oil soap will sometimes destroy vermin on house plants. It is very important to keep them clean by sponging the leaves occasionally with soap and water. We have not the pattern you want.

ROMULUS AND REMUS.—It is never polite to read in company. In the case you cite, it was inexcusable.

EDNA.—Read the "Bazar Book of Decorum" and "Ugly Girl" articles for cosmetics. Young ladies should not receive presents from gentlemen friends as a rule, and without the approbation of their parents or guardians. Flowers are an exception, though a young lady would scarcely be justified in sending them to a sick gentleman who was not an intimate acquaintance. You ask whether it is improper for a lady to kiss the gentleman to whom she is engaged before marriage. We shall not counsel such a breach of decorum, but we suspect it is sometimes done. You will be likely to produce the best impression on your friends by being perfectly natural, and affecting neither gravity, gayety, dignity, nor melancholy.—Having no acquaintance with clairvoyants, and but little faith in them, we can not give you their address, or tell you how to proceed to obtain their advice. For pretty fictitious names we refer you to the nearest vocabulary.

BANGOR.—We do not negotiate exchanges.

GRETCHEN.—Have a basque made of your three yards of silk by Worth-basque pattern, and cut the edge of your trained skirt in Gothic points.

O. F.—Harper & Brothers have never published a Lady's Book with colored fashion plates.—A black serge suit could be bought for $30.

JENNIE C. G.—Make a green silk for a young girl of seventeen by pattern of House Dress in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV.

ANNA B.—You can not wear a velvet cloak if you continue to wear mourning. Cut a Watteau mantle of your cashmere shawl and trim with fringe. Find pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. IV.

R. R.—Irish poplin is a mixture of silk and wool, and seldom looks well after being dyed. Get bombazine, and trim with overlapping biss folds of the same, alternating with crape. A good Astrakhan muff can be bought for $10. White collars and cuffs are worn with all except very deep mourning. A crape bow will do instead of a jet pin. Get a lustreless cloth or an Astrakhan cloak.

U. S. F.—The shirt fronts worn by gentlemen on full-dress occasions are of doubled linen embroidered down the middle; for ordinary use they have one or two broad pleats, or are merely doubled linen.

BELL.—Make your gray poplin by cut paper pattern of House Dress, illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV. Trim with the same and fringe.

FAUSTINA.—Use the cut paper pattern of Water-proof Cloak illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV. The plum-colored all-wool English water-proof cloth is very handsome, but is expensive.

A READER.—Make your black alpaca dress by cut paper pattern of House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV. Kilt pleating is hemmed on both edges, and is stitched on an inch below the top, then again about four inches from the bottom; the space below hangs loosely like a ruffle.

SNOWBIRD.—The cut paper pattern of the House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. IV., will be your best guide for a stylish skirt and over-skirt.

MRS. J. B. T.—The pattern of the Watteau Mantle illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. IV., is a good model for you.

MRS. J. V. B.—Make your boy's overcoat a long sack with large round cape. Simply drape your long drab skirt over a black silk skirt.

LOUISE.—Trim your pretty gray satine with kilt pleats on the lower skirt, a bias band and fringe on the upper, and basque.

JANE L.—The Bazar answers correspondents at its earliest convenience. The information asked in many letters that can not be answered for want of space in this column will be found in the New York Fashions.

B. C.—A black cashmere Watteau or velvet mantle, made by cut paper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. IV., will be handsome for a lady of forty. Astrakhan cloaks and muffs are very much worn, but are not so fashionable as seal-skin. Read answer above to "Jane L."

L. L. B.—Make your opera cloak from the pattern sent of white cashmere, and trim with gros grain bands, or side pleatings and fringe.

A. W. G. H.—The vest-basque suit pattern is what you want. We do not give addresses in this column; but you will find elsewhere the advertisement of a dealer in point lace and other fancy goods. The best guide for your velvet cloak is the Watteau Mantle illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. IV. Either of the modes of trimming you suggest will be stylish.

CANADIENNE.—You do not need an over-skirt for your long velvet dress. Velveteen would not do at all; black lace, or else faille cashmere, is the only thing we would commend. Your polonaise and kilt-pleated skirt would be in good taste.

POMEGRANATE.—Make your black silk house dress by our Worth Basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., and the poplin by Marguerite basque pattern. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 51, Vol. IV., for evening dresses.

KANSAS.—Your sample is Norwich poplin, suitable for colors as well as mourning, and it is said to wear well. Velvet and fringe will trim it well. Irish poplin is a repped goods with silk facing and wool filling, and much of it costs $3. Faille is all silk and repped; but faille-cashmere is mixed silk and wool like cashmere, but repped like faille. Paisley shawls are not fashionable, but are comfortable. A cloth or cashmere cloak, a sacque with cape over it like one that is illustrated in this number is what you want. Faille ribbon, nearly two inches wide, costs from forty to sixty cents, according to quality.

THAW.

A RUSSIAN FOLK-SONG.

PARAPHRASED BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

The ice breaks up, the streams arise,
Along the shore free Moskva flies,
In foaming rage wild gushing,
Swift rushing.

Heaven, in this mad, tempestuous hour,
Curb Moskva's dread, destructive power;
Restrain the flood, strong swirling,
Wide whirling!

Let not the pitiless waters gnaw,
And down to hungry darkness draw
Yon church-yard by the river,
Forever!

There, long, long years ago, they laid
The best, the fairest village maid.
When, heart, will cease thy aching,
Slow breaking?

Ladies' Winter Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—WALKING SUIT. Bronze cloth casaque with velvet revers. Skirt and over-skirt of cashmere of the same shade, with scalloped trimming. Bronze velvet and silk hat.

Fig. 2.—WALKING SUIT of myrtle green cashmere, trimmed with flounces and folds of the material, fringe, and soutache embroidery. Myrtle green velvet bonnet, with gros grain ribbon and feather of a darker shade.

Fig. 3.—WATTEAU SACQUE AND CAPE, WITH POMPADOUR WAIST AND FULL-TRAINED SKIRT (WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN). This elegant sacque and cape, of which we furnish a cut paper pattern from a Paris model, is the favorite wrap of the season. The original is made of olive brown cloth, richly braided and trimmed with fringe. It is worn over a Pompadour or square-necked waist and full-trained skirt of silk of the same shade.

The pattern is furnished in nine sizes, even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches, bust measure, the manner of taking which is described with the Marguerite Vest-Polonaise on page 829.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises three articles—Watteau sacque and cape, Pompadour waist, and full-trained skirt.

WATTEAU SACQUE AND CAPE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, back, cape, sleeve, and cuff. The garment consists of a perfectly loose sacque, with a deep Watteau fold in the back, extending from the neck to the bottom; coat sleeve with cuff, and deep cape. Lay the Watteau fold in the middle of the back, according to the lines of perforations, and tack it on the under side. The cape is fitted to the shoulders by a dart on each side, and is joined to the sacque at the neck, and left open in the middle of the back to the neck, where a bow is set on. The coat sleeve is finished at the hand by a square cuff. The neck of the sacque is bound with black silk, and the front is buttoned the entire length. Sew the sleeve plain into the armhole, placing the longest seam at the notch in the back of the armhole, and hold it toward you when sewing it in. The perforations show where to baste the seams, to take up the darts on the shoulders, and to lay the fold in the middle of the back. Put the pattern together by the notches, baste up, and try on wrong side out. If alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. The notches at the top and bottom show where to turn back for the hem in front.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 6 yards.
Fringe, 6 yards.

POMPADOUR WAIST.—This pattern is in three pieces—front, back, and sleeve. The perforations show where to baste the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, to take up for the side forms in the back, and to baste the lining in the middle of the back to form a V, and also the size and shape of the under part of the sleeve and the length of the waist. Baste the V which is cut out on the shoulder in the lining only. Baste up, and try on wrong side out. If alteration is needed, take up more or less in the seams. Place the longest seam of the sleeve at the notch in the back of the armhole, and hold the sleeve toward you when sewing it in. If the sleeves are too long or short, take from or add an equal quantity at the top and bottom, always keeping the same shape. Finish the neck with a cord, and trim with a standing frill of lace, with a gros grain band edged with lace below it. Trim the sleeves to correspond. An outlet of an inch is allowed for the seams.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, 2½ yards.
Lace for trimming, 5 yards.

FULL-TRAINED SKIRT.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, two side gores, and back breadth. Put the pattern together by the notches. Trim with a gathered flounce nine inches wide, surmounted by a bias band and side-pleated ruffle, each two and a half inches wide.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wine, 12 yards.
Quantity for flounce and band, 4 yards.

Fig. 4.—HOUSE DRESS. Jacket of Humboldt purple cashmere, richly braided, and furnished with revers of black velvet. Trained over-skirt of Humboldt purple silk, trimmed with flounces of the material. Short under-skirt of the same silk, trimmed with black velvet.

Fig. 5.—CARRIAGE DRESS. Black velvet casaque, very bouffant in the back, and trimmed with passementerie and guipure. Black silk trained dress, trimmed with a flounce and black passementerie and velvet. Black velvet bonnet, with bright grasses and flowers.

Fig. 6.—WALKING SUIT of deep sea blue cloth, trimmed with gros grain bands and fringe. Black felt hat and feather.

WHY TWO CHRISTMASES CAME IN ONE YEAR.

"KRISS! Kriss!" called Mrs. Santa Claus, as she went out of the house and across the yard. "Now I do wonder where that boy is," she added, looking behind the iceberg that stood like a great frosted hay-rick just in front of the stable door. Kriss was very fond of playing there with his little white bear; but neither boy nor bear was now to be seen. She then peeped into the stable, and saw the reindeer in their stalls, but no Kriss was there. "Well," she thought, as she turned back, "he can't be far away, and the smell of supper will certainly bring him home." Just as she was going in the door she saw the bear trotting clumsily but quickly off toward the north pole, which is in sight of the house. She went in then, quite easy, for she knew the boy must be somewhere near; and cutting two fine, juicy seal-steaks off the seal in the pantry, she freshened up her fire, and prepared to cook supper. Mrs. Santa Claus never permitted her family to become hungry. They always had four meals a day; but Kriss, who was growing, and needed more food, had his two lunches besides. It certainly was a great pity that neither Sir John Franklin nor Dr. Kane ever happened upon Santa Claus when they explored the polar regions. He is much more hospitable than the Esquimaux, and would have been glad to have entertained and helped them. His visiting circle is so very small that to see a stranger is quite an event, and there would have been no limit to the kindness he would have shown them. Mrs. Santa Claus goes out still less than her husband; so, although she is obliged to have several new dresses every year, she is never worried by any changes in the fashions. In fact, she cuts the clothes for the whole family just alike. When Santa Claus brings home the skins from his grand hunts, she sorts them into three piles. The largest is for Santa Claus, the next for herself, and the little ones do for Kriss. When the three are together, they are a comical-looking family, for, except in size, there is no difference in them. Another odd thing about them is, that they have but the one name in common. This became very confusing after the child became old enough to run about, as old Santa Claus would often answer the mother's call for the boy, perhaps leaving a toy half finished, and the glue cooling. He finally decided that it would be best to nickname the young Santa, and call him "Kriss Kringle"—a title he himself is known by among the Pennsylvania Dutch. After this there was no farther trouble about names.

But to come back to Kriss upon this particular evening. He was by no means even as far away as his mother had thought, for he had not only seen her, but also had heard her speak. But if she had known where he was, he would have made a quick march out. Over the stable there was a large room, neatly fitted up with shelves and boxes, where Santa Claus kept all his finished toys. Kriss was never allowed to go there without his father; but here he was now, busy as he could be. He was not, as you may perhaps think, playing with the toys, for he did not care for them now: he had had so many, and knew all the secrets about them. He had even helped his father put the squeak into the dogs and pigs, and knew just how the strings must be put into harlequins if they were to jump properly, and how the jugglers and magic lanterns were made, and so was tired of them all. He had just now, however, handled them very extensively, and was still engaged in the same occupation. He had taken out his father's great leather bags, and was busy filling them up with any thing that came nearest to hand. As every thing in the room was finished in good style for Christmas, he had, in spite of his lack of choice, made a pretty collection. His idea in doing this can be very simply explained. It was now near Christmas-time, and there was much excitement and business in the Santa Claus domicile. Santa Claus was hurried with some extra varnishing; and between dressing dolls, making candy and candy bags, and seeing that the Noah's arks and the menageries were all properly assorted, Mrs. Santa Claus never went to bed until after twelve o'clock. Little Kriss was, however, a looker-on in this excitement. His parents thought him too little to work, and he did not care to play. Still he wanted a share in the bustle; and the night before, as he lay in his little trundle-bed watching his mother tie sashes upon a whole row of dolls—for she had the latest fashions for them, if not for herself—a bright idea occurred to him. What he wanted to do was to go with his father Christmas-eve to carry the presents to the children; but he knew this would not be permitted. The year before he had accomplished it, for he hid himself among the bags and buffalo-robes in the sledge, and his father never found him until they reached Vermont, and then it was too late to turn back. But there was no hope for him this Christmas, for he knew the sledge would be well searched before his father started. Still he did not despair; and as he lay in his bed this night it flashed across his mind that he might take the deer and sleigh some night before Christmas and have a little trip of his own. He was now acting upon this idea: and so, when he had finished packing the bags, and preparing every thing necessary, he smelled the seal-steaks cooking, and, coming out of the stable, went into the house.

His mother was now busy making a walrus hash—for they always had two dishes of meat on the table—and only glanced up to see that he was all safe and right. Soon supper was ready, and the father called in; but although Kriss had but little appetite, he managed, between what he ate and what he stealthily put in his pocket for a midnight lunch, to satisfy his mother. After supper was over his father delighted him by saying that the work was now so nearly done that he thought they might all go to bed early and take a good night's rest. Mrs. Claus rubbed her eyes, and said she would be very glad to do so; and Kriss hypocritically rubbed his also, but truthfully remarked that the sooner they all went to bed the better he would like it.

It was, however, ten o'clock before they were all in bed, and almost eleven before Kriss thought it safe to start. He had some trouble, too, with the deer; for Vixen, the off-deer, would not let him harness her for some time, and then, just as he was ready to start, he found that Dancer's harness was too tight. However, after some work he made every thing ready, lugged down the bags, packed them safely with the tops up, buttoned up his little seal-skin overcoat, drew on his fur gloves, and was off. He drove directly southeast for a time, then turned south, and passed close by the shore of Hudson Bay, and crossed the St. Lawrence, and stopped in Troy, New York. Here he selected a house with a good wide chimney, took out a wax doll, a curly dog, and a candy tiger, and jumped out of the sleigh. It occurred to him at that moment that perhaps there were no children in that house. His father always knew, but how he knew Kriss could not think. Suddenly he remembered that his mother had said that there was warmth in the house where children dwelt; so he laid down the toys, took off his glove, and felt the roof, but it was icy cold. He then jumped into the sledge and drove on, stopping on several roofs to try them, but they were all cold. This, it was plain, was not the way to find out. He then thought he would go down the chimneys and look for the children. At the next house he accordingly left his toys in the sledge, jumped out, sprang down the chimney, and found himself in a large room, where a little baby lay asleep in a crib, and her mother near her in a big bed. He then went back, and getting the toys, laid them beside her. But he soon found that going on such exploring expeditions first was rather tedious work. His father always strapped a bag on his back, as every one knows, but they were all too big for Kriss to carry; so he filled his pockets with little things, stuck as many as possible in his belt, strung some around his neck, and so dressed up, jumped down many and many a chimney.

He was just going to step into his sledge, after many hours of busy work, when he happened to glance up at the sky, and saw that it was nearly day. He had intended going farther, but now had no time. He took out all his toys—but they were almost all gone—placed what he had on a good straight roof, close to the chimney, whipped up his deer, and galloped home. He had expected to have reached home before his parents had awakened, but although he took a short-cut home, he saw the smoke curling up through the keen morning air before he saw the house, and so knew that his mother certainly was up. He managed to drive quietly into the stable, and had just unharnessed the deer, and was about to give them some moss, when a shadow darkened the door; he looked up, and there stood his father! Kriss did not feel very comfortable, but his only course was plain; he followed the never-forgotten example of George Washington under somewhat similar circumstances, and owned up. The only reply Santa Claus made was to tell him to come into the house and get his breakfast. After the meal was over they all sat down around the fire, and little Kriss had to give a full account of his adventures. After he had finished his story, to which his parents listened in perfect gravity, they sent him out to feed the tame bears and walruses, while they talked the subject over. Mrs. Claus sat on one side of the fire-place, Santa Claus on the other. They were silent for a moment; then he looked at her, she looked back at him, and then they both laughed. It certainly was very funny to them, but it would not do to let him go unpunished, or he would travel off whenever he pleased, and perhaps make Christmases once a month. It was easy enough to find something to whip him with, for Santa Claus had some very fine switches all ready for the stockings of bad children; but he never succeeded in inflicting this punishment, for as soon as Kriss began to cry—and he generally started as soon as he saw the switch—his mother always ran and took him away. This being out of the question, after much discussion they concluded to make him keep up the fire in the cave of ice for three months. Santa Claus used to make his glue there, and do various odd jobs that Mrs. Claus did not like done at the shop; and as the fire had to be kept up regularly, and so needed wood every day, they knew it would be a severe punishment to Kriss, as he hated stated tasks.

But when this sentence was carried into execution it was found that Kriss was bright enough to make fun out of it. He determined, it seemed, that if he had to make fires, they should be big ones; and he piled on the wood until it could be heard crackling and roaring clear to the north pole. The reflection was often seen in the United States, and it set all the learned men to wondering why there should be so many displays of the aurora borealis that year. If they had only known that they were caused by Kriss heaping pine wood upon his father's fire, it would have saved much trouble and more talking.

But the consequences of Kriss's frolic did not stop here. When the people whose houses he visited arose the next morning, they were astonished to find the presents in their rooms. Some of them thought that there must be a new fashion regarding the time for Christmas gifts. Others thought they must have made a mistake in the date. One old lady was so flustered that she ran down into the yard and killed her Christmas turkey with her own hands, she was so afraid that it would not be done in time. In one town, where he had been especially liberal, the neighbors ran in and out of each other's houses asking what day of the month it was, consulting almanacs, and wondering what it all meant. The children, however, were perfectly satisfied; and when they received the second installment of presents from Santa Claus himself at the proper time, they were so delighted that they wished there could be two Christmases every year.

It was funny, however, to hear of the way Kriss distributed his presents; for as he knew nothing of the several inmates of the houses, he bestowed them as they came to hand. He left a solitary old bachelor an ivory rattle and a little crying pussy-cat; a little girl, not yet three months old, had a pair of skates left upon her cradle; a boy of ten found a little white hood and a tiny silver thimble in his room; a severe old maid, who did nothing but knit coarse, hard, but very durable stockings for her little nieces, and who hated games as inventions of Satan, found a set of ten-pins and a backgammon board set out upon her table; a whole family of children had nothing to divide but an empty picture-frame; and a grave old minister was surprised when he went into his study to find a fine little fiddle lying just on top of his half-finished sermon for the next Sunday.

But, puzzle as they might, nobody ever found out the truth of this frolic. As for the toys Kriss left on the roof, I do not know exactly what became of them. Santa Claus looked for them, but in vain; so it would, perhaps, be well to say now that if any boy or girl living in a town northwest of Boston found some toys, one being a walking doll and another a fishing pole, upon a roof close to a chimney, in the winter of 1870, they may know from this account just how they came there.

PARIS MODES.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

APART from politics, which are quiescent just now, awaiting the return of the National Assembly, the only question of interest at present is the chase, this being the hunting season. The chase is said to be the image of war; it is well, therefore, that all Frenchmen should become huntsmen until they can find something better to do. There is the private chase, wherein men occupy themselves solely with winged and fourfooted game; and the political chase, in which France plays the part of the game which Legitimists, Orleanists, and even Bonapartists are madly striving to run down. But while waiting for the opportune moment when one of these parties shall think itself strong enough to seize the government, the country—I mean the laborious, industrious, thinking part of the country, represented by the agricultural and mercantile classes—is becoming accustomed by degrees to the word republic; and there is reason to believe that if they are not forced to choose in haste between a republic and a monarchy, they will say in two years to the partisans of the latter: "Gentlemen, it is too late. I might have been persuaded some time ago that I was incapable of managing my own affairs; but since you saw me plunged in ruin, and waited for me to extricate myself before offering your aid, I can very well dispense with your services. I don't intend to run the risk of experiencing over again what I have just gone through. I mean to have a well-organized army, not commanded by Tuileries valets and cotillon-dancers, and to employ my forces when it is best for my own interests, and not for your designs."

While this latent movement is gaining ground slowly, Parisian life has resumed its activity, minus the imperial extravagance. Some rigorists wished to see the whole nation clad in sackcloth and ashes; to which Paris made answer: "And what of my commerce? Do you forget that I have old and new taxes to pay? Do you forget that France has an enormous debt to discharge? Are you ignorant that rigorism would kill my trade—that I am the world's market, and that, should I abandon the manufacture of tasteful and costly luxuries, the whole nation would want for bread?"

What answer can be made to such arguments? Declamation may be a fine thing, but it fills no hungry mouths: let no stern Spartan, therefore, take it amiss that Paris continues to create fashions, to fabricate luxuries, to invent taste, and to swarm with buyers.

As we predicted, the fashions are attenuated rather than transformed. Double skirts still reign, and justly, for they are elegant, graceful, and economical. It is easy to make a tunic from an old-fashioned scant skirt; and, again, this skirt can be used as an under-skirt, and but little more material will be needed for a tunic.

The supreme elegance in Parisian costume just now consists in the beautiful trimmings and graceful arrangement of a woolen costume; and this is so much the fashion that it is thought necessary to apologize for wearing any other fabric; as, for instance, "This is my old velvet dress; I must wear it out, you know."

Rich old laces are unearthed from the drawers where they have lain so long, for the dressmakers can not furnish a sufficient supply. When the white laces are very fine, they are set flat on black satin dresses. Ancient and modern point d'Alençon, ancient point de Venise, and real point d'Angleterre are the most beautiful laces that one can possess. I must make a digression here to explain that point d'Angleterre, or English point, is not at all the lace commonly sold under this name: there are English point and English application. The first is made entirely by hand, both foundation and figure, while the English application is composed of a tulle foundation, on which figures made with the bobbin are sewed. Now this tulle is always soft and too light for the figures which are applied on it, whence results a mongrel lace which is not worthy of commendation. The real Eng-glish point, which is made entirely by hand, is one of the finest laces known; its high price renders it comparatively rare, and it ranks as an heir-loom with India shawls and diamonds.

We are returning to these rich and substantial luxuries. Family laces and Cashmeres once more see the light; and these symptoms indicate the desire to break with a sham extravagance which has neither past nor future, but leads a Bohemian existence from day to day.

As may be readily imagined, there will be little dancing in Paris this winter. A few dancing-parties will be given here and there for the young girls, whose sorrows should not commence with their sixteenth year; but these will be the sole festivities, save large dinner-parties and official receptions. The ball toilettes will consequently be comparatively simple. There will be no long trains for dancing, which was absurd, but demi-trains, chiefly of tarlatan; much white muslin, for dinners, plays, and concerts; and, for small receptions, demi-trained costumes of light shades and thin fabrics, such as foulard, crêpe de Chine, Osaca crape, etc. Very pretty Louis XVI. costumes are made of foulard: for instance, gray skirt, trimmed with white muslin ruches and flounces; plain rose-colored foulard vest, open, square-shaped; princesse over dress of white foulard, with large rose-colored flowers, trimmed with ruches of white foulard edged with rose. These combinations can be varied infinitely; and this association of plain with figured foulard produces effective and comparatively inexpensive costumes.

For house dresses many costumes, which are not wholly robes de chambre, are made of very fine white, pink, blue, or gray flannel, trimmed with coarse white guipure, known by the name of Cluny guipure, and black velvet ribbon. These costumes are composed of a skirt of medium length, trimmed with three rows of coarse guipure set on plain and surmounted by a black velvet ribbon; and a large casaque, tight-fitting in the back and loose in front, and buttoned from the throat to the waist. It is confined at the waist by a black velvet belt, with a large bow without ends behind. The casaque is slightly bouffant on the hips, where it forms voluminous pleats under the belt, and has large revers on each side at the bottom. It is trimmed with a single row of guipure, headed by black velvet ribbon. This soft, light, warm flannel is known as molleton de laine.

Little girls either wear miniatures of their mothers' dresses, or a high-necked dress of Scotch plaid, and a sort of half-high polonaise of black velvet, with bretelles, the whole trimmed with bands of fur. Little boys under four years old invariably wear a pleated skirt, with a jacket to match, made with basques; above this age, they wear trowsers, vest, and a round jacket, all of the same material—black, dark gray, or dark blue cloth. A charming covering for the head is worn alike by little girls and boys; it is a sort of Cossack cap, rather high, and made entirely of Astrakhan, with a little feather standing upright at the side.

It is not yet known whether Paris will become the capital again, or will remain in disgrace. It is said that the Chamber will not return to Paris, for fear that Paris will return to the Chamber. The fact is that preparations have been made for any emergency. The hall at Paris has been newly furnished, and heaters have been put in the hall at Versailles; so that the National Assembly will have its town house and its country residence.

It is said that the Austrian embassy has determined to resume its receptions; it is also said that the French government has ordered Madame De Metternich to postpone the fêtes she intended to give; but it is said now that the change of ministers in Austria may bring about a change in the embassador to Paris, so that it is no longer certain that Madame De Metternich will receive this winter.

Meanwhile the beautiful Palais d'Elysée is being put in order, not that M. Thiers proposes to live in it, but because he intends to give official dinners, and receive the political world there this winter. His own house, which was demolished by the vandals of the Commune, is not yet rebuilt, nor would it be large enough for the receptions of the head of the government.

Every thing is going on well at Paris, and the work lacks workmen rather than the workmen work. The fact is explained by the results of the insurrection and the war. Formerly there were a hundred and twenty thousand Germans in Paris; now French artisans will not work in the shops with Germans, nor are manufacturers willing to employ possible spies. The consequence is that while there is a paucity of labor in the Parisian workshops, there is great suffering in Baden, which sent here almost all of the workmen who were employed. This suffering is the beginning of the expiation: every one should know or learn that it is impossible to harm his neighbor without harming himself at the same time. This is a moral law which no one can afford to ignore or misunderstand.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

THE RATS OF RATHO.

FAR away in the north of Ireland, encircled by belts of plantation, approached by the usual long carriage drive, surrounded by almost park-like grounds, if they had been kept in any thing approaching English order, there stood, and, for aught I know to the contrary, still stands, a large house, which, not to be personal, I shall call Ratho. It had that which is unusual in Ireland, except in the large mansions of large cities, a basement story, from the window-sills of which a green bank sloped up to the drive. The house was not a desirable specimen of architecture, neither within nor without, but its owner chanced to be very wealthy—a condition of existence which, like basement stories in buildings, is rare also in Ireland. He had well-plenished barns, a large estate, a handsomely furnished house, money in both English and Irish securities, tenants who paid with unusual regularity, and a balance at the Bank of Ireland.

Mr. Munster was a man to be envied—at least so thought a certain Larry Doylan, who owned some six or seven acres of freehold land, inherited from his father, whose father and grandfather and great-grandfather, and many other ancestors too numerous to mention, had held the "farm" from time immemorial.

Every one who knows Ireland can imagine what aspect Mr. Doylan's farm wore fifty years ago.

Fifty years ago daisy-covered were the old pasture lands, rush-grown the fields in the low grounds where the cattle grazed, while cows struggled for a bare existence with burdocks and swine-thistles.

Merrily the dandelion opened its flowers by the way-side, and floated in due time its seed abroad, a dozen other weeds following the example. No wonder the land yielded poor returns to its impoverished inhabitants, among the most anxious of whom Larry Doylan might certainly at one time have been reckoned.

"By rayson of the rats," he kindly explained; "but, glory be to God, they have at last gone to somebody better able to kape them than meself."

"Have they left you, then, Mr. Doylan?" was the question asked.

"Yes, miss; and I will tell you how it happened, if you have time to stop, for it is a curious story. Ye see," he went on, "I was that thronged with rats I did not know what to do. They ate my corn, they drank my milk, they killed my best cock, and the divil a duckling I could rase; they had got that impident they would walk out o' their holes unconsarned like, and then turn round and give ye a look, as much as to say, 'Who cares for the like of yez?' If I was going to face my Creator to-night, them beggars of rats lived better nor me and my wife and my children. It was hard work all the day long just to keep the wolf from the door and satisfy the rats.

"Well, when as I was at my wit's ends, a friend calls in, and says he: 'Larry, rats is knowledgeable creatures, and not agin listening to rayson. Why don't ye write them a letter, stating that if ye are to live yerself ye can't maintain them no longer. If ye think it needful to go into figures ye can; and supposing I was you, I would explain to them that Mr. Munster, with lashings and lavings of corn and cold victuals, has not a rat to speak of at Ratho, all the time you, with scarcely a bite or a sup for yourself or your family, are keeping all the rats in the town-land.'

"'But do you think they would understand a letter, Tim?' I asked. For you see, miss, I am no scholard, and it seems strange to me how rats should be able to read hand of write.

"'Bless your soul, Larry, rats know every thing,' Tim answered, and went away.

"Well, miss, to make a long story short, the letter was written; the school-master did it for me. He told the rats how poor I was, and how rich Mr. Munster. He said it would be a great relief to me, and a change for the better for them, if they would consent to shift their quarters. He acknowledged the life might not be so peaceful, but food would be more abundant; and lastly, he put it to them as gentlemen, whether, with a wealthy land-owner within reach, they thought it was gentleman-like, after such an appeal, to stay any longer on my premises, and eat a poor divil out of house and home.

"That was the letter as near as I can remember it, and we sealed it with a tenpenny piece, which I gave to the school-master for his trouble.

"That day I sent the wife and children out, and having laid the letter on the ground by the biggest hole I could find, sat down to watch what would come of it.

"After a bit, just as usual, appeared a rat's head, then his shoulders, then his body. He was going off on some business of his own, when he spied the letter; seeing that, he went down the hole again. Still I watched on. Presently up comes another rat, who, hearing nobody stirring, ventured out on the floor, and turns the letter right over; then he went down again. Then another came, and then another still, all different; till—not to tire you, miss—an old gray rat, that I should say must have been a hundred years old—rats do live wonderful—came up, and without more to do takes the letter down the hole with him.

"There was a great silence for about an hour; but at the end of that time there came a noise as if all the rats in Christendom were packing up to leave. Then I heard a sound as if of soldiers marching; and while I lay and watched, I saw first the gray rat come out of the hole, and then hundreds and hundreds of other rats follow.

"They went straight out of the front-door and down the hill six abreast, and I hear they are at Ratho now. As you are staying there now, miss, perhaps you can tell me for certain."

"There are plenty of rats at Ratho," was the answer; "but whether they happen to be yours or not it is impossible for me to tell."

"They never had a rat there till mine left," said Mr. Doylan, reflectively; and with that fact ringing in her ears, my informant came away.

Plenty of rats, indeed, there were at Ratho in her time; they were so plentiful that a tame eagle used to alight on a barrow containing their bodies, and critically select the fattest for consumption. They were so plentiful that from the living-rooms gentlemen visitors used to shoot them on the green slope previously mentioned.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

SOME newspaper reporter—whether with or without authority we know not—stated, when our first "cold snap" came, that the Grand Duke seemed much invigorated and inspirited. We should think he might have been, and that his spirits must have been kept up most of the time since. We do not believe a Russian winter could have opened with finer winds or sharper frosts, and Alexis need not hasten to his native land for a sight of ice and snow. If he will only linger in our midst a little longer—say till Christmas-time—he may find that America can compete with Russia in excellent skating: though, to be sure, it would not be safe to make any promises, for there is nothing more fickle than the weather; and while the young folks are all gleefully looking forward to a grand trial of skates on Christmas-day, who can tell but that an "Indian summer" or a "January thaw" may intrude into the holidays? However that may be, it will matter little to the thousands who are anticipating a "good time" when glad Christmas comes. The shops are full of pretty things for all to see, and for those to purchase who have full purses. But there are also many wretched houses in our city full of needy people: let not those forget this whose purses are full.

The school law in Texas requires all children between six and eighteen to attend school. A few days ago the school commissioners of one of the eastern counties received a touching appeal from a lady of seventeen whom they had mulcted, according to law, for non-attendance during the year. "I have a husband to care for," said the young delinquent, "a child to nurse, clothes to wash, meals to cook, and a house to keep in order. If you make me attend school another year, every thing will go to ruin."

A recent medical writer disagrees entirely with the theory expressed by some hygienic writers that one or two kinds of food at each meal are more easily digested and more wholesome than a large and palatable variety. He advises that there be as generous, agreeable, and attractive a variety at each meal as can be afforded, on the ground that a meal composed simply of dry Graham bread, or of potatoes, or of fruit even, is less digestible than one composed of all three articles.

It is stated that Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe will this year receive $13,000 profits from her Florida orange groves.

The latest invention, which will greatly interest the little girls, is a creeping doll.

The Empress Eugénie was born May 5, 1826. It was originally intended by certain residents of Paris, who had purposed to present her Majesty with a testimonial of their respect and affection, that the formal offering should be made on the occasion of her last birthday; but circumstances prevented this, and accordingly on a recent day several gentlemen went to Chiselhurst to request the Empress's acceptance of various articles. M. Charles Durozey, late of the staff of Prince Joachim Murat, laid before the Empress a present from the officers of the late Imperial Guard; M. Henri Guerard headed a deputation by whom was presented a beautiful album, massively mounted in gold, adorned with the imperial arms, and signed by 30,000 inhabitants of Paris, one signature being in a vast number of cases for the whole of the residents in the house; Mr. Howard Smith presented, on behalf of the ladies of Paris, a magnificent bouquet, with an address signed by leading members of the French nobility; and other deputations presented large boxes of bouquets.

Rome now has 1500 more gas-lights in her streets than formerly. Turin, however, has over a thousand more than Rome.

President Thiers has received one million francs for his house, which was destroyed by the Communists. The appraisers had shortly before assessed the building at only two hundred thousand francs.

"Flannel Receptions" is the comfortable name given to a new style of parties which has come into vogue in London. The ladies meet once a week in the evening at each other's houses, and sew an hour on clothing for the poor. After this the work is cleared away and the gentlemen arrive, when an elegant tea or supper is served, and after music and reading, and sometimes dancing, the company disperse at the seasonable hour of ten o'clock. Unfortunately the net proceeds of an evening's work are not mentioned in the item from which we gather our information.

Miss Catharine M. Sedgwick, a woman who was an acknowledged leader in literature and in society, used to say of herself, "Cooking is the only accomplishment of which I am vain." A New England life, especially in the country, makes a strong draft upon all the executive faculties of man or woman, and Miss Sedgwick fully and cheerfully accepted all its obligations. She could make cake as well as books, and provide for all household exigencies as ingeniously as she could construct a story. She was an enthusiastic gardener, not merely confining her care to flowers, but taking a practical interest in fruits and vegetables, which she delighted to gather in the early morning with her own hands. Her biographer speaks of Miss Sedgwick's frequent breakfast-parties as among the most fascinating banquets in the memory of her guests. On such occasions "she would be in her garden by six o'clock to gather fruit and flowers for the table, and unconscious inspirations of health and happiness for herself, of which she dispensed the latter at least as liberally as the more tangible harvest of her borders. Then, after arranging the table, and paying a visit to her tiny kitchen, where the more delicate dishes received the touch of her own skillful hand, she would make a rapid toilette, and appear, untired as the day, to greet her guests with that exquisite grace and sweetness, that genial warmth of welcome, which made old and young, grave and gay, literary celebrities, distinguished foreigners, fashionable people from town, and plain country friends, all feel a delightful ease in her presence."

One of the greatest dangers connected with skating arises from after-imprudence. Glowing with exercise, many rush into the hot waiting-room, and thence to the cold and crowded cars. Then follows a cough or cold. A brisk walk part of the way home will restore the system to its usual condition, and prevent many disastrous consequences.

In 1870 about 1700 visitors traveled through the Yosemite Valley. The total number for the season of 1871 will be about 2200.

Since Mrs. O'Leary's cow kicked over that fatal kerosene lamp in Chicago, other bovines are panting for equal notoriety. The one who has succeeded the best hails from Bay City, Michigan, and belongs to a Mrs. Lambert. One evening not long ago she—the cow, not Mrs. L.—put her head into a barrel. Not being able to get her head out, and becoming terrified at her condition, she blindly forced her way into the wood-shed, thence into the kitchen, and thence into the dining-room of the house, becoming all the while more furious. From this room she made her way into the parlor, throwing down and trampling under foot every thing that came in her way. The cow next rushed into the bedroom, and attempted to mount the bed occupied by Mrs. L. and two little children. Fortunately, at this crisis, help, which had been summoned, arrived. But a neighbor who attempted to enter the window was knocked down by the barrel—or the cow. At length the children were secured and passed through the window, the mother following, and the excited cow was left to calm her mind as best she might. So goes the story.

A correspondent wishes us to call the attention of our readers to the virtues of a simple remedy for burns, which has been tested in her family for a great many years, and always found to answer a most satisfactory purpose. The remedy in question is in the use of the well-known plant the cat's-tail, or bulrush (Typha latifolia), common all over the country in wet and swampy places. The brown tops of the cat's-tails, which are usually fully grown by the 1st of August, and can be gathered from that time until winter, are to be cut from the stems, and kept in a dry place in a bag, and when needed for use it is only necessary to take off the downy portion and mix with enough lard to form a salve, and apply twice in twenty-four hours. The relief is said to be immediate, the pain ceasing in from twenty to thirty minutes; while it has the special virtue of acting on an old burn that has become a bad sore as well as upon a fresh one.

The following bit is going the rounds of the European papers: When the conditions of the armistice had been discussed and agreed upon at Marseilles, M. Jules Favre was invited to dine with Prince Bismarck. One of the dishes served was a Silesian goose, which the French plenipotentiary found delicious. The next day, when he was taking leave, the federal chancellor said to him, "As your excellency liked the bird we had yesterday for dinner, I have had three of the same put into your carriage." M. Jules Favre thanked him and took his leave, and as he drove off, the prince, with that sneering air which is familiar to him, observed, "There go four geese!"

USEFUL RECIPES.

CHOCOLATE CAKE.—Cream together one cup of white sugar and half a cup of butter; stir in slowly half a cup of sweet milk, in which half a tea-spoonful of carbonate of soda has been dissolved; mix one tea-spoonful of cream of tartar into one and a half cups of flour, flavor the batter with lemon, and alternately to it add the flour and beaten whites of two eggs; bake in one loaf, and, when cold, with a sharp, very broad-bladed knife, cut horizontally into four layers; each layer should be about three-quarters of an inch in thickness; then spread on top of each layer, except the top one, the icing, which is made thus: beat with the whites of two eggs until stiff about six tea-spoonfuls of flour sugar; add a little lemon, and slowly stir in one cake of grated German sweet chocolate. The icing should be stiff enough not to run, but if much thicker than this add a little water.

FRUIT JELLY is delicious when made of strawberries or raspberries in their season; peaches, also, can be used, but the fruit must be pared and cut into dice, being careful not to use the discolored part around the seed. Clarify half a pound of loaf-sugar, strain and mix with it half an ounce of clarified isinglass and the juice of two or three lemons; into this stir the fruit as quickly as possible, and, pouring into a mould, place on ice; the sugar and isinglass are not hot, merely lukewarm, when mixed together. Oranges may be used, cut into dice, carefully removing every particle of seed, or the jelly will be thick-looking; only two lemons are needed when orange is used. To clarify isinglass cut one and a quarter ounces into small pieces, wash in warm water four or five times, then put into a preserving-kettle with a pint and one gill of clear rain-water, and boil slowly until reduced one-fourth, leaving three-fourths; as fast as it rises remove the scum; when done, strain through a cloth, bottle, and cork it.

LOAF GINGER-CAKE.—One scant tea-cupful of brown sugar, one even cupful of butter, one cupful of sour milk, two tea-spoonfuls of soda, and one table-spoonful of ginger, yolks and beaten whites of four eggs, enough flour to make it of the consistency of sponge-cake batter; bake in a moderately hot oven, as it is easily burned.

APPLE JELLY.—Select apples that are rather tart and highly flavored; cut and core them without paring, place in a porcelain preserving-kettle, cover with water, and let them cook slowly until the apples look red. Pour into a colander, drain off the juice, and let this run through a jelly-bag; return to the kettle, which must be carefully washed; allow it to boil half an hour; measure it, and allow to every pint of juice half a pound of sugar, and boil quickly for fifteen minutes.

THE TICHBORNE "CRAWLS."

THE singular Tichborne case, which is now on trial in England, and which is one of the most curious cases of doubtful identity on record, excites a marked interest also on this side of the Atlantic, involving as it does the title and estates of an ancient barony and an annual income of nearly a million dollars. The story is too well known to need much recapitulation. In 1853 Roger Charles Tichborne, the heir to the estate, left England for Valparaiso, and after spending a year in South America, during which time he was in constant communication with his family, was reported to have been lost in the ship Bella, which foundered on the way from Rio de Janeiro to New York. In 1858 a rumor was brought to the family by a sailor that a boat's crew had been picked up from the Bella, and carried into Melbourne. Sir James Tichborne, the father, paid no attention to this; but his wife conceived the hope that her son might have been saved, inserted advertisements in the Australian papers, and took various measures toward his recovery. Nothing more was heard, however, until after the death of Sir James in 1866, when she received letters from some one purporting to be her son, written from New South Wales, and asking for money to come to England. This was sent him, and in 1867 he arrived in Paris, accompanied by his wife and child, where he was met by Lady Tichborne, who acknowledged him as her son. His identity, however, was disputed by the rest of the family, who maintained that the mother's judgment was weakened, and that she was in a state to be deceived by any impostor. The case was carried into the courts; apparently the most conclusive testimony has been produced on either side, and whatever the verdict may be, the question must always remain a doubtful one in the minds of many whether the claimant is the rightful heir or merely a clever adventurer, destined by fate to make good the family prophecy connected with the origin of the Tichborne family, and which is illustrated in the accompanying beautiful engraving.

The family of Tichborne date their tenure of the manor of that name, situate near Alresford, in Hampshire, from the ninth century. In the reign of Henry II. the Lady Mabella Tichborne, who had been bedridden for many years, and was then near to death's door, besought her husband, the then Sir Roger, to bestow upon her such means as should enable her to leave a bequest of a loaf of bread to all applicants on the day of the Annunciation of the Mother of Our Lord (March 25) forever. In reply, her husband promised her the produce of so much of his property as she could go round while a brand, which he caused to be lighted, should burn. He fancied that by reason of her great age and infirmity she would get over very little ground; but being borne to the corner of the park, she made a rehement effort, hobbled round twenty-three acres of very rich land, known to this day as "The Crawls," and was then carried back to her bed. Presently she called her household around her, and prophesied that the Tichborne family would prosper so long as the dole was continued to the poor, but that if it was neglected, the family name would be lost for want of male issue, and that, in such case, the baronet of the day would have seven sons, but that the next heir would have seven daughters, and no male children. In 1796 a great crowd of gypsies, thieves, and other lawless characters having behaved in a very unruly manner during the distribution of the dole, the neighbors made an outcry against it, and it has never been given regularly since. In 1803 there was a partial fulfillment of the Lady Mabella's prophecy, for in that year the then head of the family died and left seven sons, the eldest of whom succeeded to the baronetcy, but he died, leaving seven daughters, whereupon that branch of the family took the name of Doughty; so that the Tichborne name was actually merged for a time.

THE HUMAN HAIR MARKET IN ALSACE.

THE HUMAN HAIR MARKET IN ALSACE.

GERMANY yields a great hair crop, and it is all the more valuable because most of the inhabitants are blonde. The scale of value is said to run thus: white, blonde, golden, flaxen, auburn, red; while darker shades are worth little more than half. We shall not be sorry if a day arrives when these poor peasant girls shall become too prosperous to barter away their tresses. But what will the ladies of fashion do then, poor things? Why, they must look for a supply nearer home. Every day there is combed out of the feminine heads of the country loose hair enough to make abundance of chignons. Most of this is burned or otherwise destroyed. In Italy it is sedulously preserved and sold. By the aid of a machine it is straightened and cleansed. The long hair is then made into switches and chignons, while the short hair is used for frisettes. The price of it depends on the color. Light and golden hair are expensive, and white hair the most costly of all.

CHRISTMAS CHURCH DECORATIONS.

PERHAPS our experiences in decorating our iron church at Christmas may be useful. We, of course, have no pillars, and the chief point is to make the east end look as bright as possible. We put a thick wreath in the window, and immediately below it, over the altar, a text in letters of tiny yellow everlastings, fastened on a card-board foundation with glue. These letters were fixed to a board covered with green laurel leaves. Our vestry projects into the church on the left side of the altar, and on that we placed a large text on three graduated boards covered with glazed calico. We work the letters by penciling an outline round patterns, and then nail on holly or ivy leaves separately, dotting bunches of berries about. The organ has a text and garland to match. On the bare walls between the windows we put emblems, stars, and triangles, made in wood and covered with leaves of different kinds, sewn on black tape and nailed on; berries here and there. We filled the panels of the pulpit with scarlet flannel, edged with holly leaves. The centre had the monogram of Christ in white everlastings, sewn very thickly on a card-board foundation. The sides were trellised with yew, with tiny medallions of four holly leaves and berries in the centre, at each point. A wreath around top and bottom of Irish ivy; berries and plumes of pampas grass finished it off. Each window had a garland made on laths, which fitted in the window-frames.

EXAMPLE FOR THE LADIES.

MR. JAMES STEWART, of Yonkers, N. Y., reports that a Wheeler & Wilson Machine, No. 38, under his charge, has been hat-binding by steam for nearly 17 years, and will now do as much work as any machine, new or old, of any make. From September, 1868, to 1869, it bound 137,088 hats, and the operator earned $654 17. The previous year she earned $507 48.—[Com.]

WORTHLESS IMITATIONS

WEBSTER'S PATENT
BUTTON-HOLE WORKERS.
Patented June 27, 1871.
One of the most important inventions of the age!
The most perfect Button-Hole Worker ever invented!

So simple that a child can work a more perfect button-hole with it than the most experienced hand can work without it. Every stitch is taken with the most perfect mechanical accuracy. Is used entirely independent of the sewing machine, and will last a lifetime. Does away with pricking the fingers, straining the eyes, and with imperfect and irregular worked button-holes. They give universal satisfaction. Ladies who use them say that they are worth their weight in gold. Over eleven thousand sold during the first week of their introduction.

The most liberal inducements offered to the trade.

Dry-Goods and Fancy-Goods Merchants find it an excellent selling article.

Local and traveling agents wanted every where. Samples and terms, with full directions for use, sent prepaid on receipt of 50 cents. Orders by mail receive prompt attention. Address

THE LANGUAGE OF THE EYES.

To find some universal tongue
That all can understand
Has long been wished by old and young
In almost every land.
They never seem to have confessed
What wondrous power lies
In that mute speech, by all possessed,
The Language of the Eyes.

Why can not people be content
With this dumb voice alone?
Perhaps because it says what's meant,
And all that's meant is shown;
So still use artificial speech,
Which hides and mystifies,
For that which truth and nature teach—
The Language of the Eyes!

How much the better should we be
If fewer things were said—
If words spun out less easily
In conversation's thread!
How many questions might we spare,
How many vain replies,
Would we but practice every where
The Language of the Eyes!

But ah! I fear too oft we feel
Shut up in hollow pride;
And what the eye would sure reveal
The word intends to hide.
We can not trust our eyes to speak—
Truth only in them lies—
And falsehood never dares to seek
The Language of the Eyes.

We are not yet so good, alas!
As that we all can say,
Look through these windows, as through glass,
And read our hearts alway;
We yet must suffer speech to fill
The world with sound and lies;
But there will be one true thing still—
The Language of the Eyes.

One of these was waiting, a few months ago, at the door of the château at an early hour of the day. Having gone to bed late the night before, the lady had not risen betimes, and the beggar waxed impatient. At last, turning to the footman, he said, "How long d'ye suppose she'll be before she comes?"

"Really, I can't say," answered the servant: "may-be ten minutes, may be an hour and a half."

"Then I'll tell ye what it is," retorted the mendicant, "she may provide herself with another beggar. Tell her that from me."

And so saying, away he went.

"TOM BEADLE MADE A BOW, AND BLADE-O'-GRASS A COURTESY."

BLADE-O'-GRASS.

By B. L. FARJEON,

AUTHOR OF "GRIF" AND "JOSHUA MARVEL."

MR. MERRYWHISTLE MEETS THE QUEER LITTLE OLD MAN.

TRULY this proved to be a night of coincidences to Mr. Merrywhistle; for he had not walked a mile before he came upon the queer little old man whom he had met on the Royal Exchange. The old fellow was leaning against a lamp-post, smoking a pipe, and seemed to be as much at home in the wide street as he would have been in his own parlor. He looked surly and ill-grained, and his eyebrows were very precipitous. His mild eye was toward Mr. Merrywhistle as that gentleman approached him; and when Mr. Merrywhistle slowly passed him, his fierce eye came in view and lighted upon the stroller. Before he had left the old man three yards behind him, Mr. Merrywhistle fancied he heard a chuckle. He would have dearly liked to turn back and accost the old man, but a feeling of awkwardness was upon him, and he could not muster sufficient courage. Chance, however, brought about an interview. Not far from him was a building that might have been a palace, it was so grand and light. It was a triumph of architecture, with its beautiful pillars, and its elaborate stone-work. Great windows, higher than a man's height, gilt-framed, and blazing with a light that threw every thing around them in the shade, tempted the passer-by to stop and admire. There were three pictures in the windows, and these pictures were so cunningly surrounded by jets of light, that they could not fail to attract the eye. Awful satires were these pictures. Two of them represented the figure of a man under different aspects. On the left, this man was represented with a miserably attenuated face, every line in which expressed woe and destitution; his clothes were so ragged that his flesh peeped through; his cheeks were thin, his lips were drawn in, his eyes were sunken; his lean hands seemed to tremble beneath a weight of misery: at the foot of this picture was an inscription, to the effect that it was the portrait of a man who did not drink So-and-so's gin and So-and-so's stout, both of which life's elixirs were to be obtained within. On the right, this same man was represented with full-fleshed face, with jovial eyes, with handsome mouth and teeth, with plump cheeks, with fat hands—his clothes and every thing about him betokening worldly prosperity and happiness: at the foot of this picture was an inscription, to the effect that it was the portrait of the same man who (having, it is to be presumed, seen the error of his ways) did drink So-and-so's gin and So-and-so's stout. A glance inside this palace, crowded with misery, would have been sufficient to show what a bitter satire these pictures were. But the centre picture, in addition to being a bitter satire, was awfully suggestive. It was this:

Whether to the artist or to the manufacturer was due the credit of ingeniously parading "Old Tom" in a coffin, can not (through the ignorance of the writer) here be recorded. But there it shone—an ominous advertisement. As Mr. Merrywhistle halted for a moment before these pictures, there issued from the Laboratory of Crime and Disease a man and a woman—he, blotched and bloated; she, worn-eyed and weary—both of them in rags. The woman, clinging to his arm, was begging him to come home—for his sake; for hers; for the children's; for God's! With his disengaged hand he struck at her, and she fell to the ground, bleeding. She rose, however, and wiped her face with her apron, and implored him again and again to come home—and again he struck at her: this time with cruel effect, for she lay in the dust helpless for a while. A crowd gathered quickly, and a hubbub ensued. In the midst of the Babel of voices, Mr. Merrywhistle, looking down, saw the strange old man standing by his side. The same surly, sneering expression was on the old man's countenance, and Mr. Merrywhistle felt half inclined to quarrel with him for it. But before he had time to speak, the old man took the pipe out of his mouth, and pointing the stem in the direction of the chief actors in the scene, said, "I knew them two when they was youngsters."

"Indeed," replied Mr. Merrywhistle, interested immediately, and delighted at the opportunity of opening up the conversation.

"She was a han'some gal; you'd scarce believe it, to look at her now. She 'ad eyes like sloes: though whether sloes is bird, beast, or fish, I couldn't tell ye, but I've heard the sayin' a 'undred times. Anyways, she 'ad bright black eyes, and was a good gal too; but she fell in love"—(in a tone of intense scorn)—"with that feller, and married him, the fool!"

"What has brought them to this?"

"Gin!" said the old man, expelling the word as if it were a bullet, and bringing his fierce eye to bear with all its force upon Mr. Merrywhistle.

Short as was the time occupied by this dialogue, it was long enough to put an end to the scene before them. The woman was raised to her feet by other women, many of whom urged her to "Give him in charge, the brute!" but she shook her head, and staggered away in pain. Very quickly after her disappearance the crowd dissolved, by far the greater part of it finding its way through the swing-doors of the gin-palace, to talk of the event over So-and-so's gin and So-and-so's stout. Not that there was any thing new or novel in the occurrence. It was but a scene in a drama of real life that had been played many hundred times in that locality. Presently the street was quite clear, and Mr. Merrywhistle and the old man were standing side by side, alone. A handy lamp-post served as a resting-place for the old man, who continued to smoke his pipe, and to chuckle between whiles, as if he knew that Mr. Merrywhistle wanted to get up a conversation, and did not know how to commence. As he saw that the old man was determined not to assist him, and as every moment added to the awkwardness of the situation, Mr. Merrywhistle made a desperate plunge.

"When I was on the Royal Exchange to-day—" he commenced.

The old man took his pipe out of his mouth, and expelled a cloud and a chuckle at the same moment.

"I thought you was a-comin' to that," he said. "You owe me a bob."

"What for?"

"I made a bet with you—to myself—that the first thing you'd speak about was the Royal Exchange. I bet you a bob—to myself—and I won it."

Without hesitation Mr. Merrywhistle took a shilling from his pocket and offered it to the old man, who eyed it with his fierce eye for a moment, doubtingly and with curiosity, and then calmly took possession of it and put it in his waistcoat pocket.

"When you was on the Royal Exchange to-day," he said, repeating Mr. Merrywhistle's words, "you sor a boy and a girl a-beggin'."

"No," exclaimed Mr. Merrywhistle, warmly; "they were not begging."

"You may call it what you like," said the old man; "but I call it beggin'; and so would that identical boy, if I was to ask him. He wouldn't tell you so, though. The boy he looked as if he was goin' to die, and you give him a copper or a bit of silver; and you wasn't pleased because I laughed at you for it. Now, then, fire away."

"Was that boy starving? Was he as ill as he looked? Was I—"

"Took in?" added the old man, as Mr. Merrywhistle hesitated to express the doubt. "Why? D'ye want your money back? Lord! he's a smart little chap, is Tom Beadle!"

"You know him, then?"

"Know him!" replied the old man, with a contemptuous snort; "I'd like to be told who it is about 'ere I don't know. And I'd like to know who you are. I'm almost as fond of askin' questions as I am of answerin' 'em. What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If you expect Jimmy Wirtue to answer your questions, you must make up your mind to answer his'n."

"You're Mr. Virtue, then?"

"You're at it agin. No, I'm not Mr. Virtue" (he had to struggle with the "V" before it would pass his lips), "but Jimmy Wirtue—and that's not Jimmy Wice. What's your'n?"

"Merrywhistle," replied that gentleman, shortly.

Jimmy Virtue was pleased at the quick answer.

"Merrywhistle!" he exclaimed. "That's a rum name—rummer than mine. What more would you like to know? What am I? I keep a leavin'-shop. Where do I live? In Stoney Alley. Now, what are you? and where do you live? Are you a Methody parson, or a penny-a-liner, or a detective, or a cove that goes about studyin' human nater, or a feelanthrofist? We've lots o' them knockin' about 'ere."

Mr. Merrywhistle was constrained to reply, but found himself unexpectedly in a quandary.

"I'm a—a—oh, I'm Nothing Particular," blurting it out almost in desperation.

"You look like it," chuckled Jimmy Virtue, so tickled by his smart retort as to be satisfied with Mr. Merrywhistle's vague definition of his calling. "We've lots of your sort, too, knockin' about 'ere—more than the feelanthrofists, I shouldn't wonder. But I don't think there's any 'arm in you. Jimmy Wirtue's not a bad judge of a face; and he can tell you every one of your organs. 'Ere's Benevolence—you've got that large; 'ere's Ideality—not much o' that; 'ere's Language—shut your eyes; 'ere's Causality—no, it ain't: you 'aven't got it. I can't see your back bumps, nor the bumps atop o' your 'ead; but I could ferret out every one of 'em, if I 'ad my fingers there."

At this moment an individual approached them who would have attracted the attention of the most unobservant. Mr. Merrywhistle did not see his face; but the gait of the man was so singular, that his eyes wandered immediately in the direction of the man. At every three steps the singular figure paused, and puffed, as if he were a steam-engine, and was blowing off steam. One—two—three; puff. One—two—three; puff. One—two—three; puff.

"What on earth is the matter with the man?" exclaimed Mr. Merrywhistle to Jimmy Virtue.

"Nothing that I knows of," replied Jimmy Virtue; "he's been goin' on that way for the last twenty year. If you're lookin' out for characters, you'll get plenty of 'em 'ere. Perhaps you're a artist for one of the rubbishy picter-papers—one of the fellers who sees a murder done in a Whitechapel court one day, and takes a picter of it on the spot from nater; and who sees a shipwreck in the Atlantic the next day, and takes a picter of that on the spot from nater. That there man's worth his ten 'undred golden sovereigns a year, if he's worth a penny; and he lives on tuppence a day. The girls and boys about here calls him Three-Steps-and-a-Puff. If you was to go and offer him a ha'penny, he'd take it."

By the time that Three-Steps-and-a-Puff was out of sight, the tobacco in Jimmy Virtue's pipe had turned to dust and smoke, and he prepared to depart also. But seeing that Mr. Merrywhistle was inclined for farther conversation, he said:

"Perhaps you'd like to come down and see my place?"

Mr. Merrywhistle said that he would very much like to come down and see Jimmy Virtue's place.

"Come along, then," said Jimmy Virtue, but paused, and said, "Stop a bit; perhaps you wouldn't mind buyin' a penn'orth o' baked taters first."

A baked-potato-can, with a man attached to it, being near them, Mr. Merrywhistle invested a penny, thinking that Jimmy Virtue intended the potatoes for supper.

"Did you ever consider," said the eccentric old man, as they turned down the narrowest of lanes, "that a big city was like a theaytre?"

"No, it never struck me."

"It is, though; there's stalls, and dress-circle, and pit, and gallery, in a big city like London. The west, that's the stalls and private boxes; the north, that's the dress-circle; the south, that's the pit; the east, that's the gallery. This is the penny gallery of the theaytre; 'taint a nice place to lay in."

He stopped before the forms of two children—a boy and a girl—who, huddled in each other's arms, were fast asleep in a gate-way. He stirred them gently with his foot, and the boy started to his feet instantaneously, wide awake, and on the alert for his natural enemies, the police. Mr. Merrywhistle was standing in the abutment of the gate-way, and the boy couldn't see his face; but the well-known form of Jimmy Virtue was instantly recognized; and as the boy sank to the ground, he muttered,

"What's the good of waking us up just as we was a-gettin' warm? You wouldn't like it yourself, Mr. Wirtue, you wouldn't."

Then he crept closer to his companion, and said, sleepily,

"Come along, Bladergrass, let's turn in agin."

The girl, who had been regarding the two dark shadows with a half-frightened, half-imploring look, as if she dreaded that they were about to turn her out of her miserable shelter, nestled in the lad's arms, and the next minute they were asleep again. All blessings were not denied to them.

"I know that lad," said Mr. Merrywhistle.

"You ought to; it's Tom Beadle."

"And he was at the Royal Exchange to-day with that poor little girl?"

"Yes, that was him. You thought he was dyin'. What do you think now?"

Jimmy Virtue seemed to take positive pleasure in putting the affair in the worst light.

Mr. Merrywhistle did not answer the question, but said, in a sad tone, "He begged of me again to-night."

"Did he, though!" exclaimed Jimmy Virtue, admiringly.

"And when I asked him if any one had given him a—a shilling on the Royal Exchange to-day, he took an oath that he hadn't been near the Royal Exchange for a month, and that he had never had a shilling given to him in all his life."

"And did you believe him, and give him any thin'?"

"Yes" (hesitatingly), "I gave him a trifle."

Jimmy Virtue stopped by a post, and held his sides. When he had had his laugh out, he said:

"Tom's a smart little thief. But you're not the first gent he's taken in twice in one day. Come, now, he's taken you in twice with your eyes shut; let him take you in once more with your eyes open."

"I don't understand."

"Them baked taters—"

"Well?"

"It wouldn't be a bad thing—like returnin' good for evil, as the preachers say—if you was to go and put them taters in the little girl's lap."

"No—no—no!" exclaimed Mr. Merrywhistle, a little violently, and pausing between each negative, "it 'll be paying a premium for dishonesty and lies."

The good fellow's heart was filled with pain as he uttered these words, which, hotly spoken, served as fuel to flame; for Jimmy Virtue turned upon him almost savagely, and snarled:

"You're a nice article, you are, a-givin' and repentin'! I've been took in by you, I 'ave. If I 'ad my fingers on the back o' your 'ead, I'd find something that would do away with your bumps o' benevolence. Dishonesty and lies! What d'you want, you and the likes? The boy's got to live, ain't he? The boy's got to eat, ain't he? If he can't work and don't beg, what's he to do? Steal? Yah! D'you think he's got money in the bank? D'you think, if he 'ad his pockets full, he'd sleep in the open air, in a gate-way?"

"Stop, stop, my good friend!" implored Mr. Merrywhistle, overcome by remorse at his hard-heartedness. He ran quickly to where the children were lying, and deposited the baked potatoes, and a few coppers as well, in the girl's lap and hands. When he came back to where Jimmy Virtue was standing, he found that worthy only half mollified.

"A-givin' and repentin'," muttered the old man, as he walked toward Stoney Alley, "that's a nice kind o' charity!" Impelled by a sudden thought, he turned back to the gate-way, and kneeling by the side of Blade-o'-Grass, opened her hot hand in which the pence were.

"He's not a bad chap, after all," he murmured, as he retraced his steps, "but it's enough to rile a feller and put a feller's back up, when a man gives and repents."

JIMMY VIRTUE INTRODUCES MR. MERRYWHISTLE TO HIS PLACE OF BUSINESS.

THE moment Mr. Merrywhistle entered the habitation of Jimmy Virtue he felt as if he were mildewed, and an impression stole upon him that he had been lying on a musty shelf for a dozen years at least, and had not been washed during the whole of the time. The place was dark when they entered, and as Mr. Merrywhistle advanced cautiously, he came in contact with soft bundles, from which a mouldy smell proceeded, and which so encompassed him on all sides that he was frightened at every step he moved, lest he should bring confusion on himself. When Jimmy Virtue lighted two melancholy wicks—tallow twelves—Mr. Merrywhistle looked about him in wonder. It was the queerest and the dirtiest of shops, and was filled with bundles of rags. Pocket-handkerchiefs, trowsers, coats, waistcoats, and underclothing of every description met his eye whichever way he turned; faded dresses and dirty petticoats (many with mud still on them, as if they had been taken off in the streets in bad weather) so choked the shelves, that some of them were in danger of bursting out; old boots hung from the ceiling; old crinolines loomed upon him from the unlikeliest of places, and, as he looked timorously up at them, yawned to ingulf him. One, hanging behind the parlor door, in the gloomiest corner, was so disposed that Mr. Merrywhistle's disturbed fancy added the lines of a woman's form hanging in it; and the fancy grew so strong upon him that, although he turned his back to the spot immediately, he could not dismiss the figure of the hanging woman from his imagination. There was an apartment behind the shop which Jimmy Virtue called his parlor; but that was almost as full of rubbish as the shop. Neither in shop or parlor was there fairly room to turn round in; if you wanted to perform that movement, you had to tack for it.

"And this is your dwelling?" observed Mr. Merrywhistle, feeling it incumbent upon him to speak, as Jimmy Virtue led the way into the parlor and motioned him to a seat.

"I don't call it by that name myself," replied Jimmy Virtue, in a not over-polite tone. "It's where I live and gets my livin', and I don't give you more than a quarter of an hour."

By which Mr. Merrywhistle understood that beyond a quarter of an hour it would not be politeness for him to stay.

"Ever been in a leavin'-shop before?" asked the old man.

"No," replied Mr. Merrywhistle; "not that I am aware of. May I ask you what a leaving-shop is?"

"This is," said Jimmy. "All them things you see in the shop and in the parlor—all them crinolines and peddicuts, and boots and dresses—belongs to poor people round about 'ere. I lend 'em a trifle on 'em, and takes care of 'em; and charges 'em a trifle when they take 'em out."

"They don't seem worth much," observed Mr. Merrywhistle, reflectively.

"Perhaps not—to you. But they're worth a deal to them they belongs to. There's a many o' them crinolines and peddicuts that comes in and out like a jack-in-a-box. Their movements are as regular as clock-work. Monday afternoon in, Sunday mornin' out."

Here, to Mr. Merrywhistle's consternation, Jimmy Virtue took out his mild eye—it being a glass one—and with the laconic remark, "A damp night makes it clammy," wiped it calmly, and put it in again. The effect of this upon Mr. Merrywhistle was appalling. To see that mild eye—knowing that it was a glass one, and that a damp night made it clammy—side by side with that fierce eye, which, as he had described, seemed inclined to fly out of its owner's head at you, was almost too much for human endurance. And as Mr. Merrywhistle looked at them—he could not help doing so, there was such a fascination in them—both eyes seemed to glare at him, and the glare of the glass was more dreadful and overpowering than the glare of the flesh. Jimmy Virtue, whose one organ of sight was as potent as if he were Argus-eyed, remarked Mr. Merrywhistle's perturbation, and quietly enjoyed it; he did not refer to the subject, however, but considerately treated Mr. Merrywhistle to as much of his glass eye as he could conveniently bestow upon him.

"Speakin' of crinolines and peddicuts," observed Jimmy, recurring to his stock, "they're not the only women's things that's left. We're in the fashion down 'ere, I can tell you. In that box that you're a-settin' on, there's a matter of seven chinons, that I takes care of regularly a week-days—real 'air three of 'em are; them as belongs to 'em I do believe would sooner go without their stockin's a Sundays than without their chinons. And now, jumpin' from one thing to another, I should like to know whether you've got over your repentin' fit, and whether you think Tom Beadle ought to be put in quod for takin' your shilliu' to-day?"

"No; I've no doubt he did it out of necessity. But I wish he hadn't told me—"

"Lies. Don't stop at the word. Out of necessity! Ay, I should think he did, the clever little thief! And necessity's the mother of invention—consequently, necessity's the mother o' lies. You want a friend o' mine to talk to you. He'd argue with you; but I fly into a passion, and ain't got the patience that he's got. He'd talk to you about Tom Beadle and little Blade-o'-Grass, and put things in a way that 'ud stun you to 'ear."

"Little what?"

"Blade-o'-Grass—the little girl that's sleepin' with Tom Beadle in the gate-way."

"What a singular name!—has she a mother and father?"

"No mother; I can't say about father. I remember him before the young uns was born. He lived in this alley, and used to come into the shop and leave his wife's things, and talk about the rights of man. The rights of man! I tell you what he thought of them: a little while before his wife was brought to bed, he cut away and left her. She was brought to bed with twins—girls—and after that she died."

"Then Blade-o'-Grass has a sister?"

"Who said she 'as? I didn't. No, she ain't got a sister. I don't know what came o' the other; but that don't matter to Blade-o'-Grass. Here she is, poor little devil, and that's enough for her, and more than enough, I'll take my davy on. Time's up."

This was an intimation that it was time for Mr. Merrywhistle to take his departure. Wishing to stand well in the eyes of Jimmy Virtue—notwithstanding the dreadful effect the glass eye had upon him—he rose, and said that he hoped they would meet again; to which Jimmy Virtue said that he had no objection.

"What do you say, now," suggested Mr. Merrywhistle, "to you and your friend that you would like to talk to me coming to take a cup of tea or a bit of dinner with me?"

"Which?" asked Jimmy Virtue. "Tea I don't care for."

"Dinner, then."

"A good dinner?"

"Yes."

"Wine?"

"Yes."

Something very like a twinkle shone in the old man's fierce eye. He rubbed his hand over his chin, and said,

"It's worth considerin' on.—When?"

"Next Saturday; any time in the afternoon you like to name."

"That 'ud suit my friend," said Jimmy Virtue, evidently impressed by the prospect of a good dinner; "he leaves off work a Saturdays at two o'clock—"

"Then we'll consider it settled," said Mr. Merrywhistle, eagerly.

"—But I don't know that it 'ud suit me," continued Jimmy, the twinkle vanishing, and a calculating look taking its place. "There's the shop. I'd 'ave to shut it up—and then what would the customers do? To be sure, I could put up a notice sayin' that it 'ud be open at nine o'clock. I keep open till twelve, Saturday night."

"Very well; manage it that way."

"I think you told me that you was Nothink Particular when I asked you what you was, and bein' Nothink Particular, time's no account to you. Now it is some account to me—it's money." Here he turned his blind eye to Mr. Merrywhistle. "If you want me to shut up my shop for six hours, say, you must make it up to me. If you want Jimmy Wirtue's company, you must pay for Jimmy Wirtue's time."

"That's fair enough," said Mr. Merrywhistle, readily, scarcely hearing the suppressed chuckle to which Jimmy Virtue gave vent at the answer. "What do you value your time at?"

"Sixpence an hour—three shillings for the six hours. Then there's the disappointment to the customers, and the injury to the business; but I'll throw them in."

Without a word, Mr. Merrywhistle took three shillings from his pocket and placed them on the table. Still keeping his blind side to Mr. Merrywhistle, Jimmy Virtue tried the coins with his teeth, and said, "Done!"

Whether he meant that he had "done" Mr. Merrywhistle, or that the word referred to the binding of the invitation to dinner, he did not stop to explain, but asked,

"Where?"

"At the 'Three Jolly Butcher Boys,' Cannon Street," replied Mr. Merrywhistle, not being confident that the resources of his establishment in Buttercup Square would be sufficient to satisfy his new and eccentric acquaintance.

"That's settled, then," said Jimmy, "and I'll bring my friend at four o'clock. And now, if you don't mind takin' a bit of advice, take this—never you go talkin' to strangers agin at such a time o' night as this, and never you accept another invitation to visit a man you don't know nothin' of."

"But I knew I could trust you," said Mr. Merrywhistle, smiling.

"Did you?" exclaimed Jimmy. "Then I wouldn't give the snuff of a candle for your judgment. I'll see you out of this, if you please."

So saying, he led his visitor out of the shop. Mr. Merrywhistle could not, for the life of him, help casting a hurried glance over his shoulder in the direction of the special crinoline which had so distressed him; and again the fancy came upon him that he saw a woman hanging behind the door. When he was in the open, however, this fancy vanished, and he breathed more freely. They stopped to look at the sleeping forms of Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass in the gate-way. The children were fast locked in each other's arms, and were sleeping soundly.

In the wider thoroughfare, Jimmy Virtue bade Mr. Merrywhistle "good-night," and as he walked back to his shop in Stoney Alley, amused himself by polishing his glass eye with a dirty pocket-handkerchief, and chuckling over the remembrances of the night.

In the mean time Mr. Merrywhistle made his way to Buttercup Square, not ill pleased with his adventure. But in the night he was tormented by singular dreams, the most striking one of which contained the horrible incident of Jimmy Virtue glaring at him with his glass eye, and swallowing at one gulp a huge baked potato, with Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass sticking in the middle of it.

THE STRANGE IDEA OF HALLELUJAH ENTERTAINED BY BLADE-O'-GRASS.

PUNCTUALLY at four o'clock on Saturday, Jimmy Virtue, accompanied by his friend, presented himself to Mr. Merrywhistle at the "Three Jolly Butcher Boys." It might reasonably have been expected that Jimmy would have made some change for the better in his appearance, in honor of the occasion; but Mr. Merrywhistle fancied that, out of defiance, Jimmy had allowed the accumulated dust of days to lie thick upon his clothes, and that he had purposely neglected to brush them. Indeed, he almost asserted as much by his manner: You saw what I was, and you forced yourself upon me; you invited me and my friend to dinner, and you must take the consequences. His only eye, as it blazed at Mr. Merrywhistle from under its precipice of bushy hair, seemed to be asking of that gentleman how he liked its owner's appearance: and it softened somewhat in the kindly glances from Mr. Merrywhistle, whose countenance was beaming with amiability and good nature.

"This is my friend that I spoke of," said Jimmy Virtue; "his name is Truefit—Robert Truefit. Truefit by name, and Truefit by nature. This is Mr. Merrywhistle, who sometimes gives and repents."

Robert Truefit came forward with a manly bow, and, when Mr. Merrywhistle offered his hand, shook it cordially.

"My friend, Mr. Virtue, here—" he said, and was about to proceed, when the old man struck in with,

"Now, I won't have it, Bob; I won't have it. None of your misters because we're before company. It's Jimmy Wirtue when we are alone, and it's Jimmy Wirtue now; and if you're a-goin' to say any thin' in apology for me, don't. I don't want apologies made for me, and I won't 'ave 'em."

Robert Truefit laughed, and said, "We must let old Jimmy have his way, Sir, so I won't say what I was going to say." Robert Truefit was about thirty years of age, and was a stone-mason by trade. He had a shrewd, intelligent face, and clear brown eyes, which, young as he was, already showed the signs of much thought. He was as manly a fellow as you would wish to look upon, and in his speech and manner there was a straightforwardness which at once won for him the good opinion of those with whom he came in contact. So conspicuous was this straightforwardness of speech and manner, that he was often called Straightforward Bob by his comrades and those who knew him intimately. Directly you set eyes upon him, you received the impression, not only that he was a man to be depended upon, but that he was one who was apt to form his own opinions, and would stand by them through thick and thin, unless absolutely convinced, through his reason, that they were wrong. He had a wife who adored him, and children who looked up to him in love and respect as to a king. He was a true type of English manhood and English shrewd common-sense.

By the time the few words were exchanged, dinner was on the table, and Mr. Merrywhistle motioned his guests to be seated. But Jimmy Virtue, turning his blind eye to his host, said, with an odd smile, "I've got two more friends outside. May I bring them in?"

Without waiting for Mr. Merrywhistle's consent, he went to the door and brought forward Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass. Presenting them to Mr. Merrywhistle, he went through a kind of mock-introduction. Mr. Thomas Beadle, Miss Blade-o'-Grass, Mr. Merrywhistle.

Tom Beadle made an awkward bow, and Blade-o'-Grass made a still more awkward courtesy. Blade-o'-Grass was the only one of the four guests who had thought fit to do honor to the occasion in the matter of dress. Jimmy Virtue, as you have seen, had made himself shabbier than usual; Robert Truefit was in his working clothes; and it would have been simply impossible for Tom Beadle to have made any change in his garments, unless he had stolen them, or had had them given to him. But Blade-o'-Grass, who, like Tom Beadle, possessed no other clothes than those she stood upright in—and those were as ragged as clothes could be—had by some strange means acquired a bonnet, and it was on her head now. Such a bonnet! If it had been gifted with a tongue, it could doubtless have told a strange story of its career. For although now it was only fit for a dunghill, it had been a fine bonnet once; and torn and soiled as it was, the semblance of a once fashionable shape was still dimly recognizable. But Blade-o'-Grass was proud of it, wrecked and fallen as it was from its high estate.

Now it may as well be confessed at once, that Tom Beadle was not at his ease. When he had made his awkward bow, he raised his eyes to the face of Mr. Merrywhistle, and recognized him. He did not know where he was going to when Jimmy Virtue had asked him if he would like to have a good dinner; and when he recognized Mr. Merrywhistle, he sent a reproachful look at Jimmy Virtue, and involuntarily squared his arms and elbows to ward off the knock on the head he expected to receive. But as Jimmy Virtue only chuckled (knowing the fear that possessed Tom Beadle), and as Mr. Merrywhistle was gentleness itself, the lad, after a time, became reassured, though he still kept his elbows ready.

"You sit down in the corner," said Jimmy Virtue to the children, "and when we've finished dinner you may eat what's left."

"Nay," said Mr. Merrywhistle, chiming in with the humor of his guest; "there is more than enough for all. Let them eat with us." And he placed the children at the table, where they sat watching the filling of their plates with gloating wonderment.

"Stop a minute, young uns," said Jimmy Virtue, arresting their uplifted forks, which they were clumsily handling. "Grace before meat. Repeat after me: For this bit o' luck—"

"For this bit o' luck," they repeated.

"Let us say—" he.

"Let us say—" they.

"Hallelujah!"

"Alleloojah."

"Now you can fire away."

And fire away they did, eating as hungry children only can eat—never lifting their heads once from their plates until they had cleaned them out; then they looked up for more.

Jimmy Virtue was quite as busily employed as the children, and ate and drank with an air of intense enjoyment. Robert Truefit had more leisure. He ate very little, having had his dinner at one o'clock. Scarcely any conversation took place until dinner was over. Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass had eaten their fill, but they still held their knives and forks in their hands, and looked eagerly at the remains of the meal. Jimmy Virtue's face had a purplish tinge on it, and his fierce eye had a mellow light in it, as he saw the children looking eagerly at the food.

"What was it you found in your lap the other mornin'?" he asked of Blade-o'-Grass.

"Nothin'," was the reply.

"Not baked taters?"

"No; we didn't 'ave 'em in the mornin'. Tom and me woke up in the middle o' the night and eat 'em."

"Wasn't you astonished to find baked taters in your lap when you woke up?"

"No; we was pleased."

"Do you know who put 'em there?"

"The baked-tater man?" asked Blake-o'-Grass, after a little consideration.

"No; it wasn't him. Guess agin."

Blade-o'-Grass considered, and shook her head; but suddenly a gleam lighted up her face. She pulled Tom Beadle to her, and whispered in his ear.

"She ses, if yer please," said Tom, "that p'r'aps it was Alleloojah."

At this suggestion Jimmy Virtue was seized with one of his fits of noiseless laughter; but both Mr. Merrywhistle and Robert Truefit looked grave. Blade-o'-Grass and Tom Beadle saw nothing either grave or ludicrous in the suggestion, for their attention was fully occupied in the contemplation of the food that was on the table. Mr. Merrywhistle, who was observing their rapt contemplation of the remains of the feast, observed also Jimmy Virtue's fiery eye regarding him.

"It's your'n?" questioned the old man of his host.

"Yes, I suppose so."

"You pay for it, whether it's eat or not?"

"Yes."

"Give it to the young uns."

"How will they take it away?"

"In a newspaper."

Sharp Tom Beadle followed every word of the dialogue, and his lynx eyes were the first that saw a newspaper on a sofa in the room. He jumped from his seat and brought forward the paper, his eyes glistening with hope. Mr. Merrywhistle and Jimmy Virtue wrapped up what remained of the joint of meat in the newspaper.

"Food for mind and body," said Robert Truefit, as the parcel was given to Tom.

Tom ducked his head, without in the least knowing what Robert Truefit meant—and not caring either. His great anxiety was to get away, now that he had as much as was likely to be given to him. Blade-o'-Grass shared his anxiety. The gift of the food was such a splendid one—there really was a large quantity of meat left on the joint—that she feared it was only given to them "out of a lark," as she would have expressed it, and that it would be taken from them presently. A premonition was upon her that she would be hungry to-morrow.

The children stood in painful suspense before the grown-up persons. Their anxiety to be dismissed was so great that they threw restless glances around them, and shuffled uneasily with their feet. But Mr. Merrywhistle had something to say first. He had great difficulty in commencing, however. He coughed and hesitated and almost blushed, and looked at Jimmy Virtue in a shame-faced kind of way.

"The other day," at length he commenced, addressing himself to Tom Beadle, "when I saw you and Blade-o'-Grass on the Royal Exchange—"

Tom, in the most unblushing manner, was about to asseverate, upon his soul and body, that he was not near the Royal Exchange, when Jimmy Virtue's warning finger and Jimmy Virtue's ominous eye stopped the lie on his lips.

"—On the Royal Exchange," continued Mr. Merrywhistle, "and gave you—a—a shilling, were you really ill, as you seemed to me to be?"

A look of triumphant delight flashed into Tom Beadle's eyes. "Did I do it well, Sir?" he cried, nudging Blade-o'-Grass. "Did I look as if I was a-dyin' by inches?"

Mr. Merrywhistle winced, as if he had received a blow.

"Oh, Tom, Tom!" he exclaimed, gently, "are you not ashamed of yourself?"

"No," answered Tom, without hesitation, his manner instantly changing.

Blade-o'-Grass, perceiving, with her quick instinct, that something was wrong, and that Tom was likely to get into disgrace because he had made the gentleman believe that he was dying by inches, stepped forward chivalrously to the rescue.

"If you please, Sir," she said, "you mus'n't blame Tom. It was all along o' me he did it."

Thereupon the following colloquy took place:

ROBERT TRUEFIT. Bravo, Blade-o'-Grass!

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE [only too ready to receive justification]. Come here, child. How was it all along of you?

TOM BEADLE [taking moral shelter behind Blade-o'-Grass]. Tell the gent the truth, Bladergrass; he won't 'urt you. Tell him about the tiger.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE [in amazement]. The tiger!

BLADE-O'-GRASS [gravely]. Yes, Sir; I got a tiger in my inside.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. Who on earth put such a monstrous idea into the child's head?

BLADE-O'-GRASS. Mr. Wirtue knows all about it, and so does all the others in Stoney Alley.

JIMMY VIRTUE [nodding gravely in confirmation]. Yes, she's got a tiger. Tell the gentleman what it does to you, Blade-o'-Grass.

BLADE-O'-GRASS. Eats up every think as goes down my throat, Sir; swallers every blessed bit I puts in my mouth; and when I ain't got nothink to give it, tears at me like one o'clock. Tom's giv me grub for it orfen and orfen, Sir: I don't know what I should 'a done lots o' times if it 'adn't been for 'im. [Mr. Merrywhistle sheds a kindly glance on Tom Beadle, who receives it with an air of injured innocence]. Well, Sir, last Monday the tiger was a-goin' on orfle, and I was so sick that I begins to cry. Then Tom comes up, and arks me what I'm cryin' for; and I tells 'im that the tiger's a-worryin' the inside out o' me. Tom feels in 'is pockets, but he ain't got a copper to give me; so he ses, "Come along o' me," ses Tom; and he ketches 'old of my 'and, and takes me to the Royal Igschange. Then he ses, ses Tom, "If any body arks you, Bladergrass, just you say that I'm your brother, a-dyin' of consumption. I'm a-dyin' by inches, I am." And I cries out, Sir, for Tom looked jist as if he was a-dyin' by inches. [A smile of triumph wreathes Tom Beadle's lips; he has the proper pride of an artist]. But Tom tells me not to be frightened, for he's only a-shammin'. Then the peeler tells us to move on, and you comes up and gives Tom a shillin'; and the first thing Tom does is to buy a poloney for me and a 'unk o' bread for the tiger.

TOM BEADLE. I wish I may die, Sir, if she ain't told the truth, the 'ole truth, and nothin' but the truth, so 'elp me Bob!

Blade-o'-Grass gazes at Mr. Merrywhistle eagerly, and with glistening eyes, and seeing that her vindication of Tom has raised him in the estimation of their benefactor, nods at her ragged companion two or three times in satisfaction. Mr. Merrywhistle, in his heart of hearts, forgives Tom for the deception—nay, finds justification for it; and the children are allowed to depart with their spoil.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. That's a sad sight and a sad tale.

ROBERT TRUEFIT. England's full of such sights and such tales.

Jimmy Virtue pricked up his ears. He knew when his friend Bob was "coming out," and he prepared himself to listen by taking out his glass eye and contemplating it with his fierce eye, polishing it up the while.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE [gently]. Not full of such sights, surely?

ROBERT TRUEFIT. Yes, full of them, unfortunately. Take London. There are thousands and thousands of such children in such positions as Tom Beadle and Blade-o'-Grass, hanging about the courts and alleys—pushed out of sight, one might almost say. And as London is, so every other large English city is. If they haven't shoals of boys and girls growing up to men and women in one bad way, they have them in another bad way. I know what old Jimmy got me here for to-day—he wanted me to talk; he knows I'm fond of it.

JIMMY VIRTUE. Bob ought to be in Parleyment. He'd tell 'em somethin'.

ROBERT TRUEFIT. That's a specimen of old Jimmy's flattery, Sir. I don't see what good I could do in Parliament. I've got to work for my living, and that takes up all my time. If I were in Parliament, I should have to get money somehow to support my wife and family, and it isn't in my blood to become a pensioner. Besides, I should be contented enough with what's called "the ruling powers" if they'd only turn their attention more to such social questions as this.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. Ah, I'm glad of that; I'm glad you're not a republican.

ROBERT TRUEFIT. Not I, Sir, though I don't know what I might become by-and-by; for there's no denying that things are unequal, and that working-men are talking of this inequality more and more every year. You'd be surprised to know what they think about this and that. And although I don't go so far as some of them do, I can't help agreeing with them in many things.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. But what do they want? Equality? Such a thing is impossible.

ROBERT TRUEFIT. I know it is. You'd have to do away with brains before you got that; though there are a many who believe that it is to be arrived at. Some of them are fools, and some of them are rogues; but some of them have really worked themselves up into absolute belief.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. Discontented people are to be found every where, and under any form of government.

ROBERT TRUEFIT. Ay, that's the way a great many sum up; when they say that, they think they have found out the cause, and that the matter is settled. 'Tisn't the sensible way to view it.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. What is the reason, then, of this spread of feeling among workingmen?

ROBERT TRUEFIT. That's a large question, and would take too long to answer. But I think the penny newspaper is partly accountable for it. They can afford to buy the penny and half-penny newspaper, and they read them, and talk more among themselves. You see, things press upon them. They are arriving at a sort of belief that the laws are made more for the protection and benefit of property than for the protection and benefit of flesh and blood; and as their value in the market doesn't lie in land and money, but in bone and muscle, the idea isn't pleasant to them.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. But surely they are not right in this idea?

ROBERT TRUEFIT. Are they not? Read the newspapers, and you'll find they are. Why, a man may do any thing to flesh and blood, short of murder, and the law won't be very hard on him. But let him touch property, ever so little, and down it comes on him like a sledge-hammer. I'll tell you what I read in the police reports this morning. A man is had up at the police court for beating his wife. The woman is put into the box, with marks on her face and with her head bandaged; the man doesn't deny that he beat her, and half a dozen witnesses prove that he beat her cruelly; the floor of the room in which they lived was covered with blood-stains. There is no excuse for him; no aggravation on her part is set up; a doctor states that if one of the blows she received had been a little more on the left of her head, she would have been killed; and the man gets three months' hard labor. Afterward a man is brought up for stealing three-and-sixpence. He is miserably dressed, and there is want in his face. The evidence in this case is quite as clear as in the other. The prisoner snatched a purse, containing three-and-sixpence, out of a man's hand, and ran away. Being searched, not a farthing is found upon him, nor any thing of the value of a farthing. The man does not deny the theft, and says he wanted a meal; the police know nothing of him; and he gets three months' hard labor. Compare these equal sentences with the unequal offenses, and you will see the relative value of property and human flesh in the criminal market.

JIMMY VIRTUE. Bob puts it plainly, doesn't he?

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE. But these cases must be rare.

ROBERT TRUEFIT. They are very common; and these two cases that I have put side by side are two of the mildest. Listen to this—another wife-beating case: Husband comes home at noon. What kind of man he is may be guessed from his words to his wife: "I've something to tell thee, you ——! I'm going to murder thee, you ——!" He takes off his jacket, calls his bull-dog, and sets it at his wife. As the dog flies at the woman, her husband hits her in the face; the dog drags her from the sofa, with its teeth in her flesh (it is almost too horrible to tell, but it is true, every word of it), and the husband jumps upon her, and kicks her on the head and shoulders. Imploring him to have mercy upon her, crying for help, the woman is dragged by the dog from room to room, tearing flesh out of her. The frightful struggle continues for some time, until the woman manages to make her escape from the house. It is dreadful to read the doctor's description of the state of the woman, and how he feared, for three or four days, that mortification would set in. The man is sentenced to—what do you think? Six months' hard labor. About the same time, a very young man is found guilty of stealing twenty shillings' worth of metal, and he gets seven years' penal servitude. But I could multiply these instances. You may say that such cases as these have nothing to do with the broad question of misgovernment; but I maintain that they have. You get your criminal material from such places as Stoney Alley, where poor Blade-o'-Grass lives; and yet Stoney Alley is as bad now—ay, and worse than it was fifty years ago. The law knows of its existence, has its wakeful eye upon it; but what has the law done for its good, or for the good of those who live there? Take the case of Blade-o'-Grass. What does the law do for her?—and by the law you must understand that I mean the governing machinery for keeping society in order, and for dispensing justice to all—out of our police courts as well as in them. Think of the story she told, and the way in which she told it. There is capacity for good in that child—ay, and in Tom Beadle too. Can you doubt that, but for your charity, she might have died of hunger?

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE [eagerly]. Then you don't disapprove of indiscriminate charity?

ROBERT TRUEFIT. Not I; I don't disapprove of a man putting his hand into his pocket, and exercising a benevolent impulse. Your lip-philanthropists, who preach against indiscriminate charity—what would they do for Blade-o'-Grass? What would they do! What do they do? "Work," they say. But they don't give her work; don't even teach her how to work, if such a miracle happened to fall in her way. And all the while the policeman says, "Move on." I know something, through Jimmy here, of Blade-o'-Grass—a hapless waif, an incumbrance, a blot, serving as a theme for countless meetings and oceans of words. What business has she in the world? But she came, unfortunately for herself, and she is so legislated for that to live is her greatest affliction.

JIMMY VIRTUE. It's my opinion that a good many of the fellers who preach agin indiscriminate charity only do so as an excuse for buttonin' up their pockets.

ROBERT TRUEFIT [laughing]. And their hearts as well, Jimmy. You put me in mind of something I saw last Sunday in Upper Street, Islington. The people were coming out of church. A couple—evidently man and wife—were walking before me, talking on religious matters—or, rather, he was talking and she was listening. I passed them just as he was saying, "If I haven't got the grace of God in my heart, I'd like to know who has got it?" and at the same moment as forlorn-looking a woman as ever I set eyes on intercepted him, and courtesied, and held out her hand imploringly. He pushed her aside surlily, and with a sour look on his face, and walked along talking of the grace of God. The woman may have been an impostor—in other words, a professional beggar; but I should be sorry to call that Grace-of-God man my friend. No, Sir, I don't think that it is a good thing to crush a kindly impulse, or that we should treat our best feelings and emotions as so many figures in a sum. It is not the giver who makes beggars. The fault is in the system, which opens no road for them at the proper time of their lives.

Mr. MERRYWHISTLE [sadly]. But tell me: do you see no remedy for these ills?

ROBERT TRUEFIT. The remedy is simple. Commence at the right end. Train up a child in the way it should go, and when it is old it will not depart from it. And by the same rule, Train up a child in the way it shouldn't go, and when it is old it will not depart from it. It is almost time for me and Jimmy to be off. Jimmy wants to open his shop, and I want to get home to my wife; but I'll just try to explain what I mean. Two poor boys, one six and one nine years of age, lost their mother; a few weeks afterward they were caught taking some potatoes from a garden. The presumption is that they were hungry. The potatoes were valued at one penny. The boys were sent to prison for fourteen days, and the state thus commenced their education. I will conclude with a personal experience. I had occasion to go to Liverpool some little time ago, and on the day that I was to return to London I saw a girl standing against a wall, crying bitterly. She was a pretty girl, of about sixteen years of age. I went and spoke to her, and soon saw that the poor girl was utterly bewildered. It appeared that she had landed that morning in Liverpool, having been brought by her sister from Ireland, and that her sister had deserted her. A more simple, artless girl I never met, and she hadn't a penny in her pocket, nor a friend in the Liverpool wilderness. I thought to myself, This girl will come to harm. Hungry, friendless, pretty— I went to a policeman, and told him the story. The policeman scratched his head. "Is she a bad girl?" he asked. I was shocked at the question, and said no, I was sure she was not; that she was a simple, good girl, almost a child—and was as complete an outcast as if she were among savages. The policeman shrugged his shoulders, and said, civilly enough, that he couldn't do any thing. "What did you mean by asking if she was a bad girl?" I asked. "Well, you see," he answered, "if she was a bad girl, and wanted to be took care of, I could take her somewhere." "Where she would be taken care of?" I asked. "Yes," he answered. "And have food given to her?" "Yes." "But a good girl," I said, "homeless, friendless, and hungry—" "Can't interfere with them," said the policeman. "She'll have to qualify herself for a refuge, then," I could not help saying, bitterly, as I turned away, leaving the poor girl in her distress; for I could do nothing, and had only enough money to take me third-class to London. There, Sir! You can draw your own moral from these things. Many a working-man is drawing conclusions from suchlike circumstances, and the feeling that statesmen are ignoring the most important problems of the day is gaining strength rapidly. For my own part, I honestly confess that, without one tinge of socialism or even republicanism in my veins, I am not satisfied with things as they are.

With these words, spoken very earnestly, Robert Truefit, accompanied by Jimmy Virtue, took his departure. But Jimmy Virtue found time to whisper in Mr. Merrywhistle's ear,

"Didn't I tell you Bob 'ud talk to you? It ain't dear at sixpence an hour, is it?"

Mr. Merrywhistle said no; it was not at all dear, and he hoped soon to see them again.

"All right," said Jimmy Virtue, with a last flash from his fierce eye; "when you like;" and so departed.

WASHINGTON'S WATCH.

IN the heart of the Ramapo Hills stands a massive mountain, called the Torn. It rises in sturdy solitude and to a great height, lifting its bare and rocky face from beautiful green forest garments, and frowning down on the valley which encircles it and the submissive river that winds its way up to kiss its feet. This mountain is called the Torn because it looked to the early Dutch settlers in old days so much like a tower, and torn was their name for tower. Indeed, it rises up like a regular bastion on a fort, and seems to have been placed there by the primeval wilderness to fend off the advancing civilization of men. But in these days of railroads and telegraphs we can very easily flank such a fortress, and the Torn has long since ceased to hinder any one's progress to the West. It stands quite neglected now. Very few people tread its steep and toilsome sides, and it gazes down on the villages and iron-works of the valley, and the railroad winding like a great serpent around its base, as if in silent bitterness, seeming sadly to recall the days when only Indian feet were masters of its neck, and only Indian camp-fires stained the bright blue air about its head. If you climb it, you find the highest point to be a great jutting yellow rock, which commands a splendid view. On a clear summer's day you can see from it almost to New York. And this is the very rock which makes the great hill look so much like a tower from below. In this rock is a long crack, or crevice, only two or three inches wide, but so deep and dark that you can not see to the bottom of it, nor any thing in it—not even if you put your eye quite close. Now there is a story to this rock and this crack, as there is to every rock and crack and every speck of dust under the sun, only people don't always take the trouble to find them out. But the legend of the Torn rock is very short and plain, and therefore easy to find out.

People say that in the time of the great Revolution Washington came here when he had been beaten on Long Island, at the beginning of the war, and was retreating through Northern New Jersey. He came with one of his generals up to the top of the Torn rock to find out the position of the English troops who were pursuing him. When he had finished looking through his telescope he saw from the darkening air that it was growing late, and took out his watch to see what time it was. Now it so happened that the watch had become loosened in some way from the chain, and as Washington put it back to his pocket it slipped into the deep black crevice instead. And they say that it lies there yet.

But the strangest part of the story is that it has never stopped going. Yes, there it is, down in the dark crack, ticking gravely and steadily and hopefully, as if it were waiting every instant to be put back into that illustrious pocket from which it came, and dared not run down meanwhile. And its great, round, white Dutch face—for it is an old-fashioned fellow—stares calmly into the surrounding darkness, and continues to tell the time with most needless precision; for what do the bats and snakes and crawling things that take refuge there care for time? And who else is there to look into the old watch's innocent face and confide in his faithful reply?

Ah, they whisper that the watch is keeping time, not for the bats, or snakes, or owls, but for Washington himself, and the great nation that Washington made and guarded through its childhood. Yes, it ticks and ticks away forever on that lonely mountain height, chattering of the great deeds done in its early days, when it filled Washington's watch-pocket so comfortably, and of the important services it rendered the great chieftain. It tells how he never would have gotten his rear-guard across the Hudson in time to escape the pursuing British, had not he, the old gold watch, whispered, "It is time! it is time!" How he had always reminded Washington that not a moment was to be lost in pushing the great cause of American liberty, and how, in fact, he had been the mainspring and guide of many an important act. But this is not all it talks of. With all these memories of the past, Washington's watch still never fails to keep time with the present day. That, indeed, is his chief business. People may say what they like about time being regulated by the City Hall, or Tiffany's, or the railroad clock, but, in fact, it is Washington's watch that is at the bottom of it all. It goes on year after year with its steady, swinging tick, and gives the time. But though it always seems to keep exactly the same rate of going, it is nevertheless as much in accordance with the present time as with that in which it was made. And this is very wonderful, for you must know that times change very much, and it is not every one born in one time who can keep up with another and later time. However, our time gets too fast to suit the old watch occasionally, and then it begins to tick very hoarsely, and to cry out, "Not so fast! not so fast!" until the country gets quiet again, and settles down to its regular rate of going. For you know it is not good to go too fast: it often brings on the heart-disease. You will see that the doctor, next time he comes to see you, will try your pulse; and if he finds it very fast he will look solemn and serious, and say you have fever. Well, when our time settles itself down again, Washington's watch stops being gruff and hoarse, and sings in a delicious, contented voice, "Cluck! That is right! that is right!"

And so the old watch will go on, as long as the republic lasts, keeping our time and all future times, let us hope, steady, and not let them run too fast or off the track. Some foolish people talk now and then of a king or an emperor, and of breaking up the republic. But I will confide to you that if ever the republic is broken up, Washington will have nothing more to do with us, and his watch will leave time to take care of itself. His watch will snap, and crumble away, and never tick to us any more from the mountain-head.

Such is the story of the Torn—at least, the tradition that came down from the Dutch settlers in that neighborhood, though some unbelieving people say that the Dutch were too fat and lazy to climb to the top of the mountain and find out whether the watch were really ticking or not, and that the whole story is improbable.

GRANDMOTHER'S DARLING.—[DRAWN BY W. J. HENNESSY.]

GRANDMOTHER'S DARLING.

IT is a joyful day in the household when grandmother's darling essays his first step, with the aid of leading-strings carefully held by her aged hands. The proud mother looks on with a happy smile, and even the ducks and chickens pause in their meal to flutter and wonder at the coming of their new master. But the young hero is the happiest of all. Glad in the consciousness of a newly acquired power, he stands, like Columbus, with a whole world before him to explore, and never dreams of the perils that await him in the discovery. Why should he, with his first step so tenderly guarded? But this loving care, which seemingly can follow him but a little way, will fill his mind with moral strength, which is better than leading-strings, and which, let us trust, will carry him safely over the rough paths of the future.

GOLDEN HOURS.

See illustration on page 845.

GOLDEN hours, indeed, are those spent with those we love. In this charming picture we imagine a twilight, with the last golden ray of the setting sun stealing in through the blind o cheat our lovers into the belief that the day has not yet departed. They sit side by side, murmuring tender words to each other as a minor accompaniment to the nocturne which the sister is playing at the piano. The mingled fragrance of the fruit and flowers blends with the music, and fills the room with a dreamy atmosphere, in harmony with the golden moments that make up the lovers' hour. The harmony is perfect, and we can fancy we hear the maiden murmuring Sir Philip Sidney's melodious rhymes:

"My true love hath my heart, and I have his,
By just exchange one to the other given.
I hold his dear, and mine he can not miss;
There never was a better bargain driven:
My true love hath my heart, and I have his."

THE BREAKING OF A SHELL.

I.—THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH.

MY story opens with a death which happened many years ago.

Picture to yourself a deep chasm in the earth, crowned by a rough, disorderly ramp, from which peer out ends of brush-wood, stumps, broken basket-work, littered over by rusted, jagged iron fragments, and that, crouched in a sheltered corner, seated on a plank supported on two stones, is a group of men. A vast concussion every now and then shakes the air: the scream of a shot, the hoarse puff of a shell, vibrate overhead.

The group is merry enough. Chaff and laughter abound. There are Major Brown and Captain Dove and two or three subalterns, among whom is Ensign Delmere, and the teller of this tale, who is the assistant-surgeon of the 105d Buffs, of which regiment a working party is now on duty in the trenches.

We are at breakfast, and we are breakfasting in unwonted luxury; for we have secured a consignment of eggs, and each man holds one in his hand, and is chipping the outside shell, prolonging the preliminaries as much as possible to enhance the enjoyment of the delicious morsel within. We are breakfasting in comfort too; for the guns are quiet this morning, and there are no signs of that infernal cannonade which often precedes a sortie from the opposing works. Delmere's servant, a lad of wonderfully quick eye-sight, is at watch in an embrasure close at hand, and at the flash of each gun he calls out to us the description of missile that is being hurled against us.

"Shot!" "Shot!" "Shot!" goes on in pleasant iteration. For shots we don't care a button, and eat our breakfast in peace.

"SHELL!" screams the lad; and away we scuttle like so many rabbits, each to his pet corner among the gabions.

"Bang!" goes the shell, right in the middle of us, and the fragments whiz and scream about as though seeking out our hiding-places.

We take our seats at the festive board once more. Delmere triumphantly raises his hand in the air.

"Which of you, my boys, can show that? I challenge you!"

There was a general laugh. The raw young ensign had the best of us seasoned warriors. Every other man had thrown away his egg in the scramble.

The lad at watch in the embrasure looked round too and grinned, enjoying the joke and his master's triumph.

"Shot!" he cried, as a lurid flash darted across our faces.

"MY GOD! A SHELL!" he screamed, a second afterward.

Too late. We threw ourselves down on our faces as a blinding sheet of flame sprang out in the very midst of us. Then it was over. We jumped to our feet again.

"All right?"

"Yes, all right; narrow shave. Come, Delmere, old fellow, jump up!"

He lay in an easy position on the ground, his face half turned toward us, and in one hand he still held his egg, the hand a little upraised. There was a smile on his face; but in a moment the smile was blurred out by a spasm of intense pain.

I ran to him. He had been struck by two fragments of shell in each thigh. He saw my grave face as I finished my examination, and pulled his cap over his eyes.

I grasped him by the hand.

"Harry," he said, "I should have liked to live so much!"

There never was such a fuss in a regiment as when it was known that little Delmere had been badly hit. He was our pet, that boy. From the drummer-lad to the cast-iron old colonel, there wasn't a soul in the regiment that wouldn't have died for him. He was such a delicate, dainty little chap, fresh from school and home, radiant in his garments, full of fun and frolic, and yet a regular lion at heart.

We really hoped to save him once. We had a long consultation about him, we doctors, and agreed that possibly, by amputating both his legs at the hip-joint, he might be saved—that is, there was no other chance. We deceived the poor boy, though. We told him if we amputated one leg, we might save the other. There never was a lad so absurdly glad to have his leg cut off. I don't mind telling you that I went into my tent and cried before I began that operation; and I'm not given to the melting mood either. And then, in my heart, I cursed all the great powers of civilization, all the leaders of races who work such woe on poor humanity. They had taken away my boy, whom I loved more than a brother; and I cursed them, and vowed I would never serve them more.

Soon after the operation he sank. He was sensible to the last, and had us all in to say good-by. It was on the 9th September, I remember, and the sun was getting low. There had been heavy firing all day, so that the ear had become deadened to it, and all of a sudden the firing ceased, and we heard ringing cheers in the camp. He had been whispering last and earnest words in my ear, but had now sunk back, overpowered by the coming chills of death.

"What's the row?" cried Delmere, sitting up, pale and wan, resting on one elbow.

"Sebastopol is taken!" cried some one, running past the hospital-tent.

"Thank God!" cried little Delmere, drawing himself up, stiff and proud; "thank God! Now I'll die like a soldier!"

He sank back and died.

Before he died he had made me his confidant in a certain matter which is the groundwork of this story. He gave me a bundle of letters, a miniature, a tiny scented glove, a ribbon he had worn round his neck. I had a mission intrusted to me which I solemnly vowed to perform. I was also to take his sword back to his father, and a few keepsakes to other friends.

So soon as I had buried my friend I obtained leave, "on urgent private affairs," and went home; and when I got home I threw up my commission.

II.—IN SURREY.

It was a hot day in October, and I was toiling up a sand-hill in Surrey, oppressed with heat and thirst; but soon I reached the top and looked down upon a richly wooded valley, through which a silver stream wound in a devious channel. Following the course of the river, I presently came to an ancient stone bridge of three arches. Sweetly embowered in trees, the venerable bridge seemed to me a cool and delightful retreat after the heat of my walk. The waters rippled and gleamed, the swifts flew up and down and through the arches of the bridge. Here I would rest for a while. Seated on one of the buttresses of the bridge was an old lady in bombazine. A placid old dame she was, with spectacles on nose and a good book on her knee. I was rather puzzled at the position in which I found her; for she didn't seem an obtrusive old lady, and yet her pose was somewhat conspicuous. But hearing a little tinkle of chatter and laughter, I looked farther, and saw reclining on a grassy bank higher up the stream two girls sketching; a third was sitting by the stream, dropping the petals of flowers into the river. The old dame was evidently placed there to give effect to the sketches. I felt it also incumbent upon me to pose myself on the bridge, so that I might enliven the landscape. I was not near enough to see the faces of the girls, but I knew by the busy working of their pencils that they had taken advantage of their model. So I rested on the bridge till they had done with me, and then I walked slowly onward till I came to the entrance to a park—a ladder stile in a wall.

"Is this Delmere Park, my lad?" I cried to a young agriculturist who was sauntering along by the wall.

"Yes it be," said he.

Now Delmere Park was the object of my quest; here I had to fulfill my mission.

The house itself I found in the middle of the park—a large white house with a classic portico, contrasting oddly with the striped sun-blinds and trim lawns about it.

I hate these big houses, with their state and style; nothing but the love I bore my friend would have made me visit such a house. There was a hall-porter, who looked doubtfully at my dusty clothes, at my knapsack, which was slung over my back, on the sword which I carried in a black leather case.

"Is Sir John Delmere at home?" I said.

"Hem! It ain't Sir John now; what was you please to want? Is it barrometers?" he said, looking again at the sword-case; "cos if it is, we don't want none."

"Do you mean to say Sir John is dead?"

"In course he is," said the porter, looking wonderingly at me.

"Then who is the baronet now?"

"It's Sir Frederick now; but I tell you it's no use; we don't want any of them sort of things."

"Will you take him my card?" I said.

"I beg your pardon, Sir; certainly I'll send it to Sir Frederick.—Is your master at home, James?"

"Yaas, I think so," said James, lazily taking my card; the difference between a vendor of barometers and Mr. Henry Baker was not so great as to cause any increased alacrity on the part of the servants.

"Sir Frederick don't know who you are, Sir; but if you wish to see him partic'lar, you can see him in the library."

I followed the servant into the library, and there I found Sir Frederick—a middle-aged man, of red beard, weak steel-colored eyes, broad nose stubbed at the point, and peevish, pompous mouth. He bowed chillily and motioned me to a chair.

"No, I won't sit down. I believe that you are the uncle of Charles Delmere, who died of his wounds in the camp before Sebastopol last September?"

"Who was killed in the trenches, you mean."

"He was wounded in the trenches, but died afterward."

"Ah, I suppose his family is the most likely to be correctly informed; but what of him—did he owe you any money?"

"I was charged by him to convey this sword to his father. I had a message to give his father, but I can not now deliver it. As his nearest surviving relative, I hand the sword to you. Will you receive it?"

"Oh yes, certainly; much obliged, very much obliged; sorry you have been put to so much trouble. Pity you didn't send it by rail: but as you are here, I hope you'll take some refreshment. No? then if you've been put to any extra expense, as far as your railway fare from London goes—second-class I suppose you came; I always travel third myself—up to that extent I shall be happy to reimburse you. Not that there's much intrinsic value in the article; you can get a very good one in Holywell Street for five shillings; but still—extremely obliged to you."

"Can you tell me," I said, "where I can find a young lady known as Miss Constance Darrel—a cousin, I believe, of my late friend?"

"Don't know indeed," said the baronet, hastily; "she was no relation of mine; know nothing about her—nothing."

"Is there any old servant living here who could give me a clew to her?"

"Now if you want to begin peering and prying among my servants, I shall withdraw my approbation of your conduct. I beg, Sir, you will consider this interview at an end. You are certain you will not partake of refreshment?—Then, James, show this gentleman out."

The baronet returned to his books without a syllable more of leave-taking. I walked out of the house, knocking my feet against the stone sill of the entrance to shake off any dust that might be upon them. How should I find out Constance, née Darrel?

As I returned by the park stile I met the young sketchers, who were evidently daughters of the house. The duenna was wandering on the other side of the wall, gathering wild flowers. They were nice, fresh-looking girls, with long golden hair hanging down to their waists, brown, fearless eyes, and bright and pearly teeth.

I took off my hat.

"Pardon me if I claim the privileges of a brother artist, and ask to look at your sketch of the bridge."

"Oh, they're not worth looking at," cried the girls; "mere sketches."

"I should like to see them, nevertheless. I may, mayn't I?"

"Oh yes, if you'll be quick," said the elder girl, handing over her port-folio. "Old Ellis will be so cross if she catches us!"

The sketch was initialed, "C. D."

"Then you are Catherine Delmere?" I said. "I have often heard your cousin Charles talk about you."

"Did you know poor Charlie? and are you a soldier too?" cried Catherine, in a breath.

"He was a great friend of mine. But I am not a soldier; I am only a surgeon."

"Oh!" said the girl, a little disappointed. I too felt the pang, and would for the moment have given any thing to have been a soldier.

"Can you tell me where I shall find Miss Constance Darrel?"

Catherine blushed to the eyes.

"Oh, I don't know indeed; you mustn't ask. There's something dreadful— Ah, here is Ellis! Ellis, we have been showing our sketches to this gentleman, who knew poor Cousin Charlie."

"But come along, my dears," said Ellis, bustling up like an old hen. "Sir, you shouldn't have spoken to my young ladies. Children, come this moment!"

I seated myself on the stile, and watched them out of sight.

Presently a little lad, in miniature leggings and smock-frock, came up to me from the direction in which the young ladies had gone.

"Be this for you, Sir?" he said, in a hoarse whisper.

It was the sketch of the bridge folded up, and underneath was written, "C. D., post-office, Trinity Street, Southwark."

III.—AMONG GALLIPOTS.

I made every possible inquiry at the Trinity Street post-office, but could learn nothing there of C. D. A fee to the letter-carrier failed to elicit any information. I wrote to many people, friends of the family, for information. No one answered me. My search was fruitless, my purse was getting low. I was walking disconsolately up and down Trinity Street, with some vague idea in my mind that somehow I should meet Constance and recognize her, when I stumbled against an old fellow-student, Tom Tapes, who was at Thomas's with me, and who carried off all the prizes of my year.

"'Allo, 'Arry!" he shouted—it was a standing joke against him that the only bone he was unfamiliar with was the aitch bone—"what are you doing now? Army, ain't it? What! left the army, eh? Looking out for a job, eh? Well, look here: the wife has lately been confined of her third; wants a change. I'm worked to death; want a change too. Go to the seaside for a month, and you take the practice. Two pounds a week, and board and lodging. You agree? All right. Come home, and stop with me till I go, and I'll initiate you into the run of the place."

Tom's place was a shop—decidedly a regular shop, except in this, that he never sold any thing, save perhaps a penn'orth of hair-oil once a week or so. You see, the inhabitants got all their drugs at the parish expense: but the parish wouldn't stand hair-oil. It was also a dispensary, mind you. From eight to eleven we visited the parish patients; from twelve to five we dispensed at the shop; from six to nine we visited again; after that we were only liable to occasional calls. For all this we got nearly two hundred a year, all told, including midwifery and vaccinations, had to find our own drugs, and were looked up to by the medical officers round about as bloated sinecurists. We had the privilege, moreover, of attending to our private practice in the intervals of our public duty.

What a wretched little hole it was too, Tom's place! A frowsy little sitting-room—consulting-room, Tom called it—was at the back of the shop, which looked into a little paved yard, dominated by squalid roofs and melancholy chimneys. And then the drawing-room up stairs, with its out-look into the chandler's shop opposite, its photographs of Mrs. Tapes and her relations—horrid, hard-featured persons—its sickly waxen water-lilies, floating in a bed of cracked looking-glass—what a chamber of horrors that was! Tom observed he hoped I'd make use of that room for reading of an evening. I'd have committed suicide if I had. I used to spend my evenings at the Ship and Shovel, and play pyramids till I could hardly stand; and then come home and sleep in the little den, and so managed to fight off the horrors pretty well.

I had almost forgotten about my mission and my quest, when one night, just as we were shutting up, an old woman, not a regular patient, came in, and asked if I would give her some medicine for a young woman as was subject to its, proffering a wine-bottle at the same time.

"What sort of fits?" I said. "Epileptic?"

"No, nothink of that sort; regular fainting-fits."

"Is it a parish case?" I said.

"Oh dear, no, Sir. The young woman can pay for herself, Sir; only I have come unbeknown to her, Sir, as she wouldn't like no notice taken of them."

"I'll come and see her."

"No, Sir; I don't think she'd like that. I think she's a young lady, Sir, who's got into trouble."

"A young lady! What's her name?"

"Caroline Davies, Sir, she calls herself; only I don't think that's her real name."

"I'll go and see her anyhow," I cried. "Show the way."

By the light of a guttering candle in a dreary garret I saw a fair young girl sitting writing—or, rather, she had been writing, and now was holding her forehead between her hands, looking hopelessly at the ceiling.

"I've brought the doctor to see you, miss."

"But I won't see him!" she cried, jumping up and putting her hands out before her. "Take him away!"

"My dear lady," I said, coming forward, "I wouldn't intrude upon you, but I was most anxious to see if you were really the person to whom I have a message to deliver, for whom I have had a long and useless quest. Now that I have seen you, I am sure that I am not mistaken—that you are, that you were—that, in fact, you were— Well, I was the friend of Charles Delmere. Is not that sufficient?"

"He is dead—he is dead—and I do not know you!"

"If we were not both of us poor, we might stand upon ceremony; but I promised my late friend I'd stand by his WIFE."

"His wife!" she cried, getting up from her chair, and sinking on her knees. "Oh, thank God! But," she said, once more rising to her feet, "they tell me I am not—that I am not his wife. They drove me from his house; they offered me a pension of shame—oh, I can't bear it!"

"I'm not only your husband's friend, but your medical adviser, and I shall not permit you to excite yourself. As for what his relations may have told you, they, perhaps, were interested in making you believe falsehoods. I have sufficient proof in my pocket to reinstate you in your proper position, and prove you to be Lady Charles Delmere. So be calm, and remember what depends upon it."

Then she burst into tears, and cried bitterly; but I didn't check those tears, for I knew she would be the better for them.

What a couple of foolish young things they had been!

But thinking the matter over calmly, I was afraid that I had been rather too confident in my assertions. After all, was I sure that the marriage was legal? and my shot as to her being Lady Charles Delmere was a very wild one. Of course she couldn't be Lady Charles at all; she might be Lady Delmere—Dame Constance Delmere, to be accurate; but the old baronet survived his son, did he not; and in that case she wouldn't have any title at all, only her jointure. However, I began to call her Lady Charles, and stuck to it all through, and so I shall stick to it to the end of this story. Looking at the thing quietly, it wasn't such plain sailing, after all.

Possession is so much, and the advantage of position. I thought of the lordly hall in Surrey; the flunkies and the feudal state, the lawyers and the agents, and the bankers' balances; and then I looked at poor Constance in her garret, with hardly a crust to eat; her only friend a needy surgeon's assistant—you could call me nothing better—with five-and-twenty shillings in his pocket: my heart sank within me.

IV.—THE ENCHANTED PRINCESS.

We had a boy at Tom's place, a capital dispenser. I could leave him in the shop with perfect confidence, his master had grounded him so thoroughly in the routine of parochial medical practice.

"Parish patients," Tom would say to the boy, "have only two ailments. Either it's ahem, or else it's ahum. If it's ahem, give 'em chalk; if it's ahum, give them Epsom salts. If they're not the better for one, try an alterative—give them the other."

There was a big bottle of chalk mixture on a lower shelf, an immense jar of Epsom salts close beside it. Every thing else was put away out of the reach of the lad, so that he couldn't go wrong.

It was with an easy mind, therefore, that I left the shop to visit my fair and distinguished patient. She looked wonderfully different now—sad, indeed, but radiant with purpose. I didn't wonder that poor Charles had lost his heart, she was of such rare beauty. I couldn't look at her without a feeling of half intoxication. Such as I was, my life was at her disposal; but of what avail my life? It was money she stood in need of, and I had only five-and-twenty shillings.

I told her as much.

"Five-and-twenty shillings, have you? To me that seems a fortune. See here, here are manuscripts; I have written, oh, so much these last few months—my only escape was to write; my heap of white paper a little tunnel, as it were, from a dull and dreary world into a world where every thing is fresh and bright."

"Or a trap-door," I suggested, "such as the enchanted princesses passed down, when they danced their shoes away in the garden with the talking trees."

"Or the hole in the mountain that leads into Fairy-land."

"Come, Lady Charles, this is not practical. We must have money to carry on the campaign. What can we do with five-and-twenty shillings?"

I couldn't think of any thing. There was a baby coming—an heir to the estate and title, perhaps. That it should be born in these squalid lodgings might taint its birth with suspicion.

The inspiration came upon me with a flash—we would go and take possession of Delmere Hall.

V.—THE START.

Where was the soi-disant Sir Frederick? He was in London, I knew, attending the Phantomological Society's meetings. He was an ardent disciple of that faith. Where were the girls? Gone to Brighton, to be out of the way of the falling leaves. I had heard they were going when I was at Hurstham.

The first thing to be done was to send three telegrams.

One to the housekeeper at the Hall to send a carriage "for Lady Charles," to meet her at the Hurstham station that evening.

One for the family doctor at the village, to attend Lady Charles at the Hall that night.

One to the local lawyer, to meet Lady Charles's man of business at the same time and place.

She shrank from all this, implored me to give it up; but I would not. "In justice to your child," I said, and silenced her.

The three telegrams cost three shillings. Poor Constance had only one dress left her, the cotton one in which I had first seen her. To me she seemed a queen in that old cotton dress. The housekeeper at the Hall might have a different impression. First appearances would be every thing. Were we a doubtful-looking party, we might have the door shut in our faces. Constance had, for lack of bread, pawned all the really good garments she had possessed. A black silk dress and a black Astrakhan traveling-jacket were redeemed at a cost of nine shillings.

Robed in these, as she came down to the cab that stood by the squalid lodging, she seemed a very empress.

Cab eighteen-pence; first-class to Hurstham for my queen, six shillings; third-class for myself, two shillings. Why, my purse was, like Fortunatus's, inexhaustible! I had still three-and-sixpence left.

Once seated in the train and whizzing away to Hurstham, a profound depression succeeded the excitement of the day. All kinds of gloomy forebodings haunted me. We should fail, we should be ignominiously turned out of the Hall as impostors, perhaps handed over to the police. For myself I had no hope; it was ever my lot to be unsuccessful: misery and want would track me all the days of my life. But for her, for Constance—ah, my ideas grew clearer as I thought of her; the swarm of buzzing, stinging thoughts took flight.

The train stopped; I saw a carriage standing at the gate.

"Is Lady Charles's carriage here?" I shouted, jumping on to the platform.

"All right—met," said the footman; "where's her ladyship's luggage?"

VI.—THE FINISH.

The housekeeper didn't know us from Adam and Eve; I could tell that by her way: she had only been there a few weeks, however, and she didn't like to appear ignorant of the family connections. All the principal servants were in town with their master. The hall-porter remained, and eyed me suspiciously. He seemed as if he half remembered me.

"Are you her ladyship's wally?" he said to me.

"No, I'm only her secretary; and I desire you'll address me with more respect, Mr. Porter."

The man grumbled and growled, and retired to his den.

The doctor came bustling in, and was shown up to Lady Charles—the lawyer presently. And now my task began. I took him to the library and made him sit down, ordered in some refreshment, and then commenced my story. He was a young man; fortunately for me, a youth of spirit and ambition. My story charmed him, I could see; I found he caught a spark of the fire that burned within me. I told him how I had been the early friend of Charlie Delmere from the days we had been at Westminster together; that he had joined the 103d Buffs against his father's wish, who intended him for the Guards, that he might serve with me and see some fighting. I told him of his sad death, and of the secret he had confided to me—the secret of his marriage to his cousin Constance. And then I showed him the proofs. Yes, every thing was in order—with one exception; and my heart sank as I saw the lawyer put his finger on the blot. Yes, the certificate of marriage was in the name of Charles Doughton and Constance Darrel.

"She didn't know it!" I cried; "I have her letter here affirming that."

"Such a misdescription would not be fatal," said the lawyer, "if the other party to the marriage were ignorant of it; but it throws an awkward obstacle in the way. What induced him to do such a foolish act?"

"Why, it was in this way—they were married by bans."

"What foolishness! They should have had a license—it's only swallowing an affidavit. She was an orphan; he had only a father—why did he not get a license?"

"Charlie Delmere could never have perjured himself—"

"One kind of deception's as bad as another, I think," said the lawyer.

"Well, they were 'asked' at Brighton parish church, where the family had been staying—I know what interminable lists of names they ble over there. So Charles thought they'd escape notice among all these names; but as the servants of the house went to church, to make all safe he gave in his name as Charles Doughton—a name, after all, to which he was as much entitled as the other; for his father's name was really Doughton, although he took the name of Delmere when he came into this property."

"Then why wasn't the marriage acknowledged when Sir John died, if they were too much afraid of the old man to own to it before?"

"The poor thing was friendless. No one would believe her, especially when they found no register of the marriage she alleged to have taken place; and you'll mind that as she knew nothing of the change of name, she couldn't give the clew. So they offered her a small pension out of the estate, which she refused, and went away and tried to support herself as a governess; and then her state revealed itself, and she was obliged to leave, poor thing; and then she tried to earn a living by writing; she could paint a little too, and sold sketches to the little shops; and then I found her and brought her down here, and by —— I mean to stand by her."

"And so will I," said the little lawyer; "and I think we shall win. Possibly the marriage might have been voidable—I can't say that offhand; but, at any rate, it can't be voided now. There would have been a difficulty without you in identifying the parties married; but with your evidence and your letters we have the thing in a nutshell. But, after all," he went on, clouding over again, "what do we gain if there's no heir male? Supposing a girl—look at the matter from the most unfavorable point—what then?"

"Why, Lady Charles would be entitled to jointure."

"I think not; I'm afraid not. Let's see—when did Sir John die?" he said, taking out his note-book. "Yes, at six o'clock in the evening of the 9th of September. Now what is the date of the son's death?"

"The 9th September, at five o'clock," said I, after a pause, during which I had been trying to misremember the hour if I could; but I couldn't.

"Then he predeceased his father, and his widow gets no dower. Behold, on one side, a boy—a fine position, the guardianship of a good estate; on the other, a girl—nothing, absolutely nothing, beggary."

"Stop," I said, as my eye caught the large globes standing one on each side of the fireplace; "how about the difference in time?"

"That would go against us: the nearer the sun the earlier the clock."

Yes, so it was. I was confounded. We had undertaken all this risk, then, for a mere chance. Not a favorable chance either, the odds in any birth being in favor of a female. If a male child were not born to Constance Delmere, she must go forth from her husband's roof-tree once more a beggar.

The doctor came in.

"Ladyship very unwell; travel and excitement too much. I need hardly say I recognized my old friend Constance. Give me the clew to the mystery."

The matter was explained to him.

"Poor thing," he said, "I'll do my best for her: but I can't change the sex, you know. You mustn't expect too much."

Presently the doctor returned to his patient. We sat up by the library fire and watched. The hours passed; we had each fallen asleep in our chairs. Suddenly we sprang to our feet.

There was a tremendous knocking—a knocking the noise of which penetrated all the luxurious draperies of the library.

Opening the door, we heard Sir Frederick's voice in the hall. He had returned, and we had taken no precautions against his admission.

"What's the meaning of all this? Telegram! I sent no telegram! Lights! fires!" he roared, "and all this extravagance! what does it mean? Brown, you go if this goes on. Lady Charles, forsooth! what Lady Charles? Fiddle Lady Charles! it's some impostor. Who's with her?"

"By jingo!" I heard the hall-porter cry, "it's the barrometer man. I knew him; I thought I did! James, look to the coats and umbrellas."

We went out to meet Sir Frederick in the hall. I own I funked the encounter.

But coming down the opposite stairs, radiant and beaming, was the doctor, and all through the house there sounded the feeble piping cry of a new-born infant.

The effect upon Sir Frederick was magical. He put his fingers into his ears, and ran headlong from the hall.

"Stop, Mr. Frederick, stop!" cried the doctor; "stop, and see the young baronet.—Yes, we're safely through, gentlemen; mother doing charmingly. Extraordinary idiosyncrasy that of Mr. Frederick's—never could abide the squall of an infant. Always went away when his own were coming, and didn't come back till they could be put away out of ear-shot.

"To think of my old friend Constance being married to poor Charles all the time, the sly young puss!—Come, Thomas, start off, and set the church-bells all a-ringing, and broach a cask of old Sir John's prime stingo in the hall."

And there ended my knight-errantry. From that time forward Constance had no lack of friends. Piping swells were her trustees, bland baronets were her bankers. Does she ever think, I wonder, of the young parish doctor and his five-and-twenty shillings?

ADDENDA BY A FEMALE HAND.

Did I ever forget him, I wonder? and yet, would you believe, the foolish fellow never came near me, to let me thank him, for ever so many years. But he came back to me at last, and—well, we put an end to the romance of the thing by getting married.

THE DUEL TO THE DEATH.

AN ACTOR'S STORY.

THE Theatre Royal, Barnchester, was a prosperous establishment at the time, now many years ago, when I was a member of its company, and when the tragic event occurred in which I was most unwittingly concerned. By the aid of a strong corps dramatique, backed up by London stars, the business for several seasons was maintained in a flourishing condition. In those days I was supposed to be learning the art, which I have long since abandoned, and to which I took well: it matters nothing to my story why I took to it. Many a young fellow has, in his early days, strutted and fretted his hour upon the stage, and then, fortunately for himself and others, been heard no more.

Our manager was also our stage-manager, and in these capacities was more successful than in that of an actor, in which vocation he, nevertheless, labored. He was always very civil to me—indeed, he was always very civil to every body—and we got on capitally together. It may, therefore, seem unreasonable to say that I never liked him, but such, notwithstanding, was the case. Despite his general popularity with his company, arising chiefly, I believe, from the punctuality which he observed in all his payments, I fancied I saw a sinister expression in his eye, and a suppressed tone of savagery in his manner when ruffled, which betrayed a nature unsafe to rouse to enmity, and capable of nourishing the direst feeling of revenge. I believe my suspicions were finally verified. Heaven forgive me if I wrong him! but the circumstances which eventually led to the termination of my career as an actor will forever in my mind go far to justify the prejudice with which he inspired me, for they gave birth to a conviction which I have never been able to overcome, and, right or wrong, I shall see in it to the end of my days the reason why, as with the instinct of a dumb animal, I disliked him from the first moment we met.

Life behind the scenes of a country theatre is not, perhaps, very refined. Much that is objectionable, of course, is to be found there, but, at the same time, much that is honest, hard-working, sincere, and kind-hearted; and I am safe in asserting that these virtues, and many more, were combined in the person of Julia Halworth, our leading young lady—a clever, graceful novice, who was struggling hard to maintain her widowed mother and three younger sisters, and, if possible, to avoid bringing the latter into a profession with the drawbacks to which she was well acquainted. Nevertheless, her task was not easy, her salary was small, and she had the greatest difficulty in eking out her resources. It is not wonderful, therefore, that she was, by degrees, induced to listen to the avowals of devotion made to her by Mr. Caugar, our manager. He was old enough to be her father, but he was in a position to place her, as his wife, in comparative comfort; for, unlike most men in his capacity, he had been very careful, and was supposed to be well off. There was a whisper that he had not been overscrupulous in the way he had made his money. A little privateering during the latter days of the great war, and since then some successful smuggling transactions, had, it was said, contributed largely to the wealth which he had recently embarked in ventures theatrical, for which, like many a sailor, he had a strong predilection, a certain similarity existing between the management of a ship and that of a theatre. I could see that much maternal pressure was used to induce Miss Halworth to recognize the advantages of a home such as Caugar could give her; but I could also see that if she did so, it would be at a great personal sacrifice, for not only did she seem to share my own innate repugnance to the man, increased, probably, on her part by the disparity of their years, but I strongly suspected there was a prior attachment. Of this, indeed, I was eventually convinced, and although I never knew precisely what had passed, the prologue to my tragedy had shaped itself briefly into something of this kind.

She had been induced to take up the noble art of acting by watching the successful career of a young fellow named Bernal Rutherstone, whom she had known from childhood, and whose efforts for his family were akin to those she was making for her own. After winning a fair reputation in the provinces, he had made a very favorable impression on the London public, and, by degrees, had gained considerable fame. His progress had been very carefully noted, step by step, by Julia Halworth, and, added to her own natural love for the art, had inspired her with a determination to devote herself to the stage with the hope of winning equal renown. I imagined—nay, I was sure—there had been on her side some deeper feelings involved; but probably with him it had been only a boy-and-girl flirtation, which had died away, leaving no mark, for they had not met for several years, and I knew they did not correspond. Nevertheless, he was the hero of her life: his doings, his successes, formed the one theme on which she was never tired of expatiating.

When, therefore, it was announced that Mr. Rutherstone was coming to play an engagement at our theatre, bringing with him a new play in which he had met with tremendous success in London, Miss Halworth did not hesitate to express her joy at the prospect of meeting her old friend, and of being able at last not only to see him act, but to act with him. This juncture of affairs happened just at the time she was weighing in her mind the answer she was to give to our manager's proposals, and it was then that the doubt and perplexity with which she viewed them came under my notice. On the one hand, she saw herself bound to a man to whom she had an antipathy, but who would immediately relieve her from the anxiety which the care of her mother and sisters entailed upon her (for Caugar had not failed to avail himself of the strong argument which her affection for her family placed in his hands); and on the other, freedom not only to pursue her art with the hope of achieving a great London reputation, but to indulge in the dream that it might not always be upon the stage alone that she would have to play the heroine of a domestic drama, with Bernal Rutherstone for its hero.

The manager's smooth words and promises had quite won over to his side Mrs. Halworth, a selfish, indolent woman, who, congratulating herself on the comfort that would accrue to her from her daughter's marriage, quite lost sight of the fact that Caugar was not altogether disinterested, and had no intention of Julia's leaving the stage, for he was fully aware of her capacity, and knew he should be making no bad investment by diverting her future earnings into his own pockets.

"I think you would do well, Mrs. Halworth, somewhat to check your daughter's outspoken admiration for Mr. Rutherstone. I was not aware until his engagement with me was announced this morning that she had ever been acquainted with him. It is scarcely becoming for any young lady to express her predilections in such glowing terms, but you can understand that it is peculiarly unpleasant for me to hear her, when the delicate nature of our present relations is considered. She said but now that it was the cherished dream of her life some day to play the heroine to his heroes, and that directly he had heard she was to do so here he had written to her, reclaiming his old acquaintance, and reminding her of their early hopes of some day forming an alliance which, at any rate behind the foot-lights, should astonish the world. Now, you know, loving her as I do, this was not agreeable to my feelings, and if I seem to be a little jealous at such words, you can hardly blame me, especially when she promised that I should have my answer to-day; but since the bills have been out about Mr. Rutherstone she again puts me off, and declares she can not decide in so much haste. She has tortured me already long enough, and this coincidence is, to my mind, very significant."

"Oh, dear me! pray don't think any thing of that kind, Mr. Caugar; I am sure you have no cause to be anxious. She must make up her mind; she promised me she would yield to your wishes, and this enthusiasm about her old friend is only part of that which she shows on all matters concerning her profession. It is true that in better days, during my poor husband's lifetime, as children, Julia and Mr. Rutherstone knew each other, and were constantly playing at acting; but they have not met for years, and this letter, I am quite sure, is the first my daughter has ever had from him. It is chiefly about some stage directions, dresses, and hints he wants her to attend to; you shall see it."

"Well, well! it may be so, but I shall keep my eyes open when they meet, and I must warn you that I will not be trifled with. If I see any thing to justify the suspicion which her conduct has suddenly aroused, I wash my hands of the whole affair, I withdraw my proposals, and I leave you to your present life of penury. Meanwhile, caution her, and exercise your authority by compelling her to make her choice."

Thus much of a conversation I involuntarily overheard one evening while standing at the wing waiting for my cue, the speakers being merely separated from me by the canvas of the scene; but it was sufficient to make me also keep my eyes open when Bernal Rutherstone arrived. This he did in a few days, and rehearsals of a new play in five acts, called "The Duel to the Death," were immediately entered on. It is unnecessary for my purpose to refer to any thing but the one great scene—the sensation, as it would now be called—of the piece. It is the story that grows out of the story of the drama that I am concerned with, the real tragedy evolved by the mimic one.

The plot was long and gloomy, culminating in the situation from which the play took its name, in which the hero is shot at the very moment his mistress, too late to avert the fatal bullet, rushes forward and falls across her lover's lifeless form. Upon this climax to the fourth act the act-drop descends. In London the great success of the drama had arisen from the reality and care with which this scene had been rendered, and an immensity of time and pains was therefore spent at our theatre in order to do it equal justice. The whole extent of the stage was occupied by an elaborate "set," representing a secluded glen.

Principals and seconds arrive; certain pacific overtures are made by the blameless combatant, one Mark Mayburn, and rejected by the villain Houndsfoot, who is the cause of the contest. Not only does he refuse to listen to them, but insists that it shall be indeed "a duel to the death!" So it is settled that lots are to be drawn for the first shot, which is to be at twelve paces: this falls to Houndsfoot. In the event of his missing, he who is fired at (Mayburn) then steps forward one pace and delivers his fire. If this, in its turn, be unsuccessful, the duelist who had fired first then steps in another pace and delivers his second shot. Thus gradually reducing the distance, and alternately firing, the chances are supposed to be equalized, and the two enemies brought closer and closer together.

Cool and blood-thirsty deliberation marks the conduct of both. Three shots have been delivered on either side, but only two have taken effect. One has slightly wounded Houndsfoot; and the other, fired by himself, has knocked the pistol from his antagonist's hand. A great point was to be made of this incident, and of the renewed efforts of the seconds to bring about a peaceful arrangement. The blood of both principals, however, is too much aroused, and Mark Mayburn now equally insisting on its being a "duel to the death," pistols are reloaded, ground is again taken up, and in horrible proximity to each other the duelists prepare for their last encounter. The word is given: in another minute all is over, and Mayburn, with a bullet through his heart, falls to the ground just as the luckless heroine enters, as I have described.

It was my fate to be cast for the part of Houndsfoot, while, of course, Mr. Rutherstone played that of Mark. We had never met before, but soon understood each other, and I willingly fell into his few little caprices about the "business" of our scenes together. We went through the duel over and over again, according to the stage directions of the London theatre, carefully arranging our relative positions, and so disposing every thing as to bring out the points of the incidents and the dialogue with the utmost dramatic effect. I need not go into these in detail; the final one, to which every thing gradually worked up, is sufficient. We started from the opposite corners of the stage, so as to give the greatest appearance of space; thus the fatal shot was fired in the most conspicuous part of the boards.

At the first rehearsals we, of course, only snapped our pistols at each other, and our seconds merely went through the motions and time of reloading the pair with which we were both supplied; but as it was necessary at last to carry out actually what was to be done at night, we went through the firing, and much powder was burned and noise created ere Rutherstone expressed himself contented with the way in which the business went and the scene was acted. At first, in firing at him, especially when we came to close quarters, I used to point the pistol well over his head, according to the usual practice in such cases, for the sake of safety; but so determined was he to carry out the reality of the effect that he insisted on my aiming straight at him. "Depress your muzzle a little, so as to clear my face," said he, "and no wadding or flame can hurt me. The effect is absurd to see the pistol fired clean over me."

This, therefore, I did, though somewhat reluctantly, for it is a nasty feeling, that of deliberately taking aim at a man, even though you may know that the charge is harmless. However, over and over again we repeated the scene: three shots each, the intermediate business, then my fourth—the fatal one—Mark's fall, the girl's entrance, and the tableau. Now in this same fall Rutherstone used to make, in my humble judgment, a great mistake, and I ventured to tell him so. I said that a man shot in that way would assuredly fall forward, and not backward, as he did, and that all those with whom I had ever conversed who had seen a man killed by a bullet told me that the dead on a battle-field were nearly always found face downward, which fact had given rise to the expression, "biting the dust." He disputed the statement, and adhered to the one only little bit of conventionality in his performance.

So he persisted in his "own business," as we technically called it. The moment I had fired he took one step toward me, raised his arms, and fell flat on his back with a heavy thud. It is true that by the disposition of the characters on the stage this gave a capital opportunity for the heroine to throw herself across his body, and the arrangement was picturesque enough; but to my mind it spoiled his otherwise truthful interpretation of the part. He was not a conventional actor, but this bit of acting was so in the extreme.

For over a week the piece was in rehearsal, during which time I could not fail to notice the close intimacy which sprung up, or, more properly speaking, was renewed, between Julia Halworth and Rutherstone. In a thousand little ways incidental to the actor's art I saw that something besides the merely inevitable familiarity consequent upon playing together had arisen between them, and I likewise saw that this had started into life all the latent fury with which I had credited Caugar, in spite of his bland manners, smooth smile, and soft voice. There was a desperate struggle going on within him: at times it cost him his utmost strength to control himself. Jealousy, deep, revengeful jealousy, had taken possession of him—a jealousy which could have sprung only from a sincerer love for the girl than I had supposed him capable of; but it was only in this item of his disposition that I had wronged him; in all else he bore out, to my keen eyes, my original idea of his nature. In his capacity of stage-manager he was, of course, present at the rehearsals, and, in addition to this, he played the part of one of my seconds in the duel, thus being continually brought into contact with every one concerned in the scene.

It was on these occasions that I noted especially what was uppermost in his mind. Once I chanced upon him talking with Miss Halworth as I passed down to the wing to go on. She had evidently just given him her ultimatum.

"This, then, is your answer," I heard him mutter between his teeth, and almost losing, in his ill-suppressed rage, the soft, urbane tone of his usual voice. "For this I have been kept in miserable suspense for weeks. I little thought when I came to terms with Rutherstone that I was wrecking my chance of domestic happiness for the sake of professional renown. Confound him!" he continued, in a still lower voice, as he turned away; "he shall not wear her, though he has won her—she shall never be his wife; I'll put an end to his engagement first, by some means."

Julia half followed him to the wing, and said, hesitatingly, "I must be candid; I told you I did not think I could ever like you, and now Bernal is here, I know it; our old feeling has—"

"Spare me that reference," interposed Caugar; "this is no time for such a discussion. You shall repent your conduct, be sure. You are called, Miss Halworth;" and she had to go down to her entrance, and await her cue.

"JULIA HALWORTH RUSHED IN."

"Did he threaten her?" I thought. "What would his savage nature lead him to do? Anything," I said to myself, as I observed the diabolical expression which had overspread his face.

Our last rehearsal had been gone through to the satisfaction of every body. I had made a final appeal to Rutherstone respecting his fall; but, with the greatest good temper, he told me to mind my own business, and be sure not to fire the pistol over his head, as I had still always a tendency and inclination to do.

The evening came; the house was crowded. The first three acts had gone splendidly; every body was delighted, and the act-drop rose on the beautifully managed scene in which the duel was to take place. There could be no doubt that if this could be carried out in the realistic manner with which every thing else had been done, success was certain. Carried out in a realistic manner? God help me! Who could have foretold the reality of what was to follow? Who? Well, there was one person, I shall ever believe, who could have done so: but I must not anticipate.

At length the action had reached the fatal moment. As we crept closer and closer together the three unsuccessful shots on either side had been delivered amidst breathless expectation on the part of the audience; the pistol had been knocked from Mayburn's hand, the pacific efforts of the seconds rejected, and the hush of anxiety, the suppressed terror and emotion so palpable in a large assembly when its interest is thoroughly aroused and absorbed, was at its height.

A great deal of business was made of the reloading for the next encounter, my seconds drawing aside, as also did Mayburn's, for the purpose. Then the weapons were handed to us with great ceremony, and we were once more face to face, as the dialogue expressed it, "at such close quarters as could scarcely fail to bring about a fatal issue."

It was, of course, again my turn to fire first. I took the pistol from Caugar's hand. Would that mine at that moment had been paralyzed forever!

Amidst the breathless expectations of the audience I raised my arm. By a glance Rutherstone renewed his caution against my habit of firing too high; and when the word was given, determining that he should have no complaint against me, I, leveling the muzzle straight at his breast, pulled the trigger. The report, so much louder than usual, and the sharper recoil of the pistol, in themselves, during that brief second of time, alarmed me; and as I saw Rutherstone, instead of stepping toward me and falling back, as I have described he did at rehearsal, spring high into the air, and then fall forward on his face at my feet, I knew instinctively what had happened! Not so, however, Julia Halworth, who, waiting for her cue at the wing, rushed in, and, like a clever and ready actress, adapted her movements to the changed position of her lover's body; not so, either, the audience, who thundered its applause at the startling effect of the scene as the act-drop descended.

Little, indeed, did the spectators conceive the reality of what they had witnessed; little, indeed, did they conceive that they had beheld a veritable duel to the death; and least of all could they imagine what a frightful tragedy was passing on the other side of that curtain before which the multitude, now released from the tension in which it had been held by the performance, was beginning to laugh and talk after its habitual fashion at the play. For some minutes the actual condition of affairs was not even realized behind the scenes. With the exception of myself and one other actor on the stage, nobody believed but what Rutherstone, still to quote the technical phrase, had altered his "business" on the spur of the moment.

But when Julia had been helped to her feet, and he still made no effort to move, a panic seized those who stood near—a panic which increased to a fearful terror as a thin line of blood began slowly to flow across the boards from beneath his body.

They raised him. He was dead! Already the expression of agony on his face was becoming settled and rigid; and there, upon the very spot where, a few minutes before, he had been going through the mimic show of preparing to his fate, he had met it—and by my hand! But how? What had chanced? As if by magic a surgeon was by his side laying bare his breast, and in a moment the mystery was solved. The ramrod had been left in the pistol, and had gone straight into his heart!

Hours passed before poor Julia could be made to realize this discovery; but no sooner had we there upon the stage made it than, to add to the horror of the situation, a call was raised for the actor in the front of the house, and the band simultaneously struck up the entr'acte music.

It was a dreadful moment—too dreadful longer to dwell on. The explanation was simple, and it flowed easily enough from the glib tongue of our smooth-spoken manager. Could he ever hold up his head again? Could he ever forgive himself for his carelessness? From my observation of him subsequently, he did both; but he said—and this, perhaps, was not altogether untrue—that the event had cast a dreadful shadow over the rest of his life; it certainly has over mine. At any rate, as my second, in reloading the pistol for the last time, he pleaded that he must by accident, in the nervousness and excitement of a first night, have forgotten to remove the ramrod. Nothing more could be urged; but it had the effect of making me forswear the player's art; I never could go through the mockery of pretense again.

The barrier to Caugar's alliance with Miss Halworth was removed, but need I say that she never gave her hand to him?

☞ THE Publishers take pleasure in announcing that they have secured for the new Volumes of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR the most brilliant and fascinating array of literary and artistic attractions ever offered simultaneously to the American public. They comprise, for immediate issue, besides others that will be in due time announced in these columns, the following works:

"MIDDLEMARCH," a new serial story by GEORGE ELIOT, commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for December 16.

"MISS OR MRS.?" by WILKIE COLLINS, illustrated with striking full-page engravings from original drawings.

"BLADE-O'-GRASS," by B. L. FARJEON, author of "Joshua Marvel," with many beautiful illustrations, commenced in HARPER'S BAZAR for December 16.

"THE GOLDEN LION OF GRANPERE," by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, with illustrations, to commence in the February number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

They have also secured the plates and advance sheets of "LONDON: A PILGRIMAGE," by GUSTAVE DORÉ and BLANCHARD JERROLD, a new and magnificent series of illustrations from the pencil of the great French artist.

A new Novel by Miss THACKERAY, whose writings have won deserved popularity by their purity of tone, genial imagination, and fascinating style, will be commenced early in the year.

The great Spanish statesman, EMILIO CASTELAR, will furnish an important and interesting paper for an early number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE on "Republicanism in Europe."

These unprecedented attractions will require occasional literary Supplements to HARPER'S BAZAR and HARPER'S WEEKLY, which will be included in the regular issue, free of charge to subscribers.

We congratulate the readers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR on the rich and tempting intellectual repast provided for their enjoyment, and upon the rare privilege of sitting down to their monthly or weekly feast of fancy and flow of soul with such a select and excellent company of entertainers as GEORGE ELIOT, WILKIE COLLINS, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, CHARLES LEVER, Professor DE MILLE, B. L. FARJEON, GUSTAVE DORÉ, Miss MULOCK, Miss BRADDON, GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, M. D. CONWAY, PORTE CRAYON, BAYARD TAYLOR, R. H. STODDARD, JOHN HAY, HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, EUGENE LAWRENCE, Dr. I. I. HAYES, THOMAS NAST, SOL EYTINGE, Jun., CHARLES PARSONS, W. L. SHEPPARD, JULES TAVERNER, and many others of high rank in the world of letters and art. In securing this unprecedented array of splendid names, the Publishers are only carrying out their original design, and fulfilling what they conceive to be the legitimate duty of the conductors of widely circulated and popular periodicals. They intend that wherever their periodicals circulate they shall exert a healthful influence in every department of literature and art; and that in the future, as in the past, they shall be not only unsurpassed but unapproachable in the sphere of illustrated journalism.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR meet and satisfy the intellectual wants of the great mass of intelligent American readers; and in treating of literary, political, social, or domestic themes, offer an amount of wholesome instruction, recreation, and amusement which will be sought elsewhere in vain. They represent, therefore, for every American household the Graphic Literature of the World.
